*EARL PERCY moved the Amendment (standing in the name of the hon. Member for the Central Division of Hull) to except from the operation of the Rule Bills affecting the government and administration of India. The Prime Minister had stated so explicitly that he would accept no further exceptions to the Rule that he moved the Amendment with some hesitation. But he moved it with the object of obtaining some expression of opinion from the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who had been closely connected with the administration of India, as to the expediency or inexpediency of referring Indian Bills to the new Committees. There were circumstances which differentiated Bills affecting India from the kind of Bill the House had now been discussing. Nobody pretended that the legislative interests of India had suffered under the existing system. Secretaries of State for India had not been great legislators in the past, measures which had been recommended by the Indian Government had waited for sixty years before Secretaries of State had been found ready and willing to embody them in Bills. Bills affecting India were never controversial, at all events in a Party sense; any attempt to obstruct such Bills would be regarded as a scandal, and practically there was no difficulty, however late it was in the session, in getting these Indian Bills through the House and passed into law. In that respect they enjoyed exceptional facilities already. Moreover, India was not represented in the House, and the great advantage of discussions in Committee of the Whole House was that they got the benefit of the knowledge of those who were practically acquainted with the affairs of India from personal experience. Nothing could be more inappropriate than to send these Bills to a Committee upstairs, composed on a Party basis, where proceedings were not reported, or not reported fully, and where they had no absolute guarantee that they would secure the presence of those who were conversant with the problems involved. The withdrawal of Indian Bills from the House would constitute a serious departure from precedent, and would be understood in India, he thought, as implying even greater impatience in that House of Indian affairs than was imputed to them at present. On these grounds he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would at all events make this one exception to the rule.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 10, at the end, to insert the words, '(c) or Bills affecting the Government and administration of India.'"—(Earl Percy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said the Prime Minister had already stated the intention of the Government to allow no exception whatever. The question as to whether a Bill should be referred to a Standing Committee or to the Whole House would have to be settled on its own merits. The Secretary of State for the time being would be the best judge as to whether there should be any departure from the ordinary course of procedure. Legislation with respect to India was exceedingly limited. With one exception in the last ten years Indian business had consisted of financial arrangements for the issue of loans and other matters, which had been very fully discussed in the House, but by a very limited number of Members. There would be no injury done to India by this Rule. The Government could not consent to any exception. Each question must be dealt with at the time, and in the circumstances of the time, having regard to the opinion of the House and of the country.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR E. CARSON then moved to add the words "Where a Bill has been committed under the foregoing provision of this Standing Order, a Member shall have the same right of speaking on the consideration of the Report of such Committee as if the Bill was before a Committee of the Whole House." He regretted exceedingly, he said, that the Prime Minister, through no fault of his own, was unable to be present while he dealt with this Amendment. Anybody who had followed the course of the proceedings upon these Procedure Resolutions would not wonder that he moved this Amendment, nor could he help expressing considerable regret at the way in which the Prime Minister had acted in reference to the question. When he was in the House yesterday he heard the Leader of the Opposition challenge the Prime Minister directly with an absolute breach of faith in connection with this Amendment, and from that time to this the Prime Minister had never denied the charge. That was not a pleasant state of things to exist. He did not mind so much that the right hon. Gentleman had never denied the charge, but he thought that he might at least have given some explanation of the course he had taken. Whether they would have an explanation he did not know, but at all events he did not think that they would have it from the Prime Minister himself. So far as he was concerned he would have preferred that anything unpleasant which he had to say should have been said in the presence of the Prime Minister rather than in his absence. His Amendment was a perfectly plain and distinct one, and had exactly the same meaning to-day that it had on Thursday. He would add that anything that he might say would have the same meaning to-morrow that it had to-day. It was a cheap way of getting rid of Amendments to make promises when those promises were not kept. It was, after all, only a difference, as had been pointed out, between a statement and an intention; but he would be able to show that they had both the statement and the intention. The necessity for the Amendment arose from the fact that everybody admitted that the House on some stage of a Bill ought to have absolutely free discussion as to its details, and it was with a view to obtaining that discussion that he had put down his Amendment; and he believed it was with that view that the Prime Minister originally accepted it. He appealed to the generosity of the Government, which they knew to be one of their supremest qualities, to inform them as to the manner in which these Committees would work as regarded the minority, which was of very small proportions at the present time. He knew that some hon. and right hon. Gentlemen thought that the smaller the minority the more they ought to be gagged. On some of the Committees the minority would not be able to be represented at all, or at any rate very inadequately. If that was so, surely there was all the more reason that when a measure came from Committee to the House, they should have an opportunity of discussing it just as if the Committee Rules applied. He believed that any Members who had taken part in Committee work would agree that the way in which the House and country got educated in the details and real effect of any Bill was by discussions in Committee. If the House was not satisfied with his statement on that point he could refer them to the statement of the Prime Minister on Thursday last. He did not want to take out of the speech of the Prime Minister anything that was not in it. The Prime Minister said—

> "There was an Amendment standing in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University, which said:—'Where a Bill has been committed under the foregoing provision of this Standing Order a Member shall have the same right of speaking on the consideration of the Report of such Committee as if the Bill was before a Committee of the Whole House.'"

Then the Prime Minister went on to say—

> "That would give the House in the case of a Bill considered upstairs the power to discuss it as if they were in Committee. Without binding himself to the exact words of this Amendment, the Government were perfectly willing to accept it in spirit."

The spirit of that Amendment was that the right hon. Gentleman would give the House in the case of a Bill considered upstairs the power to discuss it as if they were in Committee. Proceeding, the right hon. Gentleman said—

> "Therefore there ought not to be so much apprehension as there appeared to be that the Government wished to impose undue restrictions to the powers of the House itself."

Later on in the debate the Prime Minister said—

> "While all other Amendments of the kind were to be rejected, his Amendment he was prepared to accept."

The Prime Minister made that statement after fuller consideration, and later on he stated that—

> "He had already said that the Government would enlarge the liberties and privileges of Members on the Report stage."

Had the Prime Minister accepted the spirit of his Amendment? He had provided that two Members of the House should have the right to discuss a Bill as if they were in Committee. It was probably a terminological inexactitude in which the right hon. Gentleman used the word "House" as meaning two Members of it. He denied that that was accepting the spirit of his Amendment. On the contrary it was killing the spirit, and leaving them a mere corpse. The facts were there recorded, and he would await with interest the explanation. The Prime Minister, referring to himself in the course of the debate, stated that he could not understand the ingratitude of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin in not rising at once and proclaiming how pleased he was that he should be honoured by the Prime Minister, and singled out as one whose Amendment would be accepted. He congratulated himself upon possessing in this case a prophetic instinct that it would be far better to wait for the performance of Liberal promises before expressing gratitude for them. He ventured to say that in the annals of their debates the right about-face of the Prime Minister upon this question was almost unparalleled. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 10, at the end, to insert the words, 'Where a Bill has been committed under the foregoing provision of this Standing Order, a Member shall have the same right of speaking on the consideration of the Report of such Committee as if the Bill was before a Committee of the Whole House.'"—(Sir E. Carson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. McKENNA (Monmouthshire, N.) said the right hon. Gentleman, who knew that the report he had read was a most incomplete and inadequate statement of the speech of the Prime Minister, had chosen to base himself upon some garbled extracts, which were not, in fact, the whole of the reported speech, in order to substantiate this very absurd charge of breach of faith. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh, oh."] The right hon. Gentleman was in the House when the Prime Minister made that speech, and he must have heard every word of it.

Sir E. CARSON said he quoted from three speeches, and he heard two of them delivered.

Mr. McKENNA said that at any rate the right hon. Gentleman heard the Prime Minister use his arguments in favour of accepting his Amendment in spirit. The argument which the Prime Minister used was that very strong objection had been taken by the Leader of the Opposition to the fact that if a Bill was discussed in the House only on Report, the Minister in charge would be under great disadvantage if he were not allowed to speak twice. The Prime Minister could not, on that Amendment, elaborate the argument for or against the words put forward by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. But his right hon. friend threw out as an offer to hon. Gentlemen opposite, basing himself on the views of the Leader of the Opposition, that he would accept in principle the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. If his memory served him right, the Prime Minister went further than that, and referred to the fact that during the Committee stage of a Bill it was very rare indeed that a private Member, unless it happened to be the hon. Member who moved the Amendment, desired to speak more than once. That was the view of the Prime Minister, and certainly he had that in view when he spoke of accepting the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member opposite in principle. What had the Prime Minister done? The fact was that the argument of the Leader of the Opposition in favour of the Minister in charge speaking twice was a very powerful one. The Prime Minister had also in mind the fact that the mover and seconder of an Amendment were very often placed at a disadvantage, if they were dealing with a complicated and difficult matter, in not being able to speak more than once, especially if the Minister in charge of the Bill gave a perfunctory answer without dealing with the merits of the case. It might also be that in such a case it was only the mover of the Amendment who had sufficient knowledge to inform the House that the reply given was insufficient, and it was necessary that he should be able to speak a second time. Those were the views of the Prime Minister, and those were the only cases which had to be met. [OPPOSITION cries of "No, no."] He challenged any hon. Member opposite who had had experience of the protracted Committee stages of Bills in the House to deny the accuracy of his statement when he said that it was a rare occurrence that any hon. Member desired or attempted to speak more than once during the discussion of an Amendment on the Report stage. That was a matter of fact which could easily be fortified by a reference to the debates. He had had ten years experience in the House, and his statement was justified by that experience. The Prime Minister, desirous of meeting the views of hon. Members opposite and of meeting the particular difficulties of the case, did make the promise, and he submitted to the House that the right hon. Gentleman had fulfilled that promise in the most complete form. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh, oh."] Hon. Gentlemen opposite need not imagine that they were to be moved by those shouts of "Oh." He remembered that in the last Parliament if any argument was raised on the opposite side of the House which could get no answer from the Government, the Prime Minister of the day used to come down and charge hon. Members on the Opposition side with making a personal imputation on the honour of Members. Now that hon. Gentlemen were themselves sitting on the Opposition side the tune was different. Now they had constant allegations of breach of faith. Neither one statement nor the other had the slightest foundation in fact. When hon. Gentlemen were bankrupt in argument there was nothing to rely on except these absurd charges. [Cries of "Oh."] On the merits of the proposal of the right hon. and learned Gentleman it was obvious that it went much beyond the needs of the case. What was proposed by the Prime Minister provided that the mover of an Amendment and the Member in charge of a Bill should have the right to speak as if they were in Committee of the Whole House. He thought sufficient had been done to meet the necessities of the case. The Prime Minister had not only fully carried out the promise which he made, but he had gone further and introduced the Amendment in a form which would be most satisfactory in the working of the Rules of the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had misrepresented, unintentionally, what occurred the other night; he had misrepresented what occurred in the last Parliament. He never recollected a case, which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to think occurred so frequently, in which he was charged with breach of faith, and he certainly remembered no case in which that charge could properly be made. Whenever there was, as was inevitable, an occasion of misunderstanding between the two sides of the House, his invariable practice was to give way on the point, because he thought that nothing was worse for the House than that doubt should arise on the assurances given by Ministers with regard to the conduct of business. Those were not the principles of the present occupants of the Treasury Bench. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Withdraw."] They were not the principles on what that bench now acted. The thing was really beyond dispute. It must be remembered that in the fullest and most explicit manner he stated, yesterday, exactly what their feeling was upon this point, and the grounds which justified that feeling. The Prime Minister had an opportunity of replying, of making a personal explanation if he wished to do so, of giving an answer in the ordinary course of debate, and he remained silent. And if he had nothing better to say than what had just been said on his behalf by the Minister for Education, he was bound to say he thought the Prime Minister was well advised. He pointed out yesterday that, not only had they on that side of the House taken the obvious view of the Prime Minister's promise, but that his own supporter in the person of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy had also taken the same obvious view.

MR. MCKENNA: The right hon. Gentleman has referred to my hon. friend the Member for Kirkcaldy. He probably has forgotten the fact that the Prime Minister was not in the House when my hon. friend spoke.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said he did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was right in his recollection or not, but it did not touch the essence of his argument. The point of his argument was that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy represented many of the supporters of the Prime Minister, and when they had this universal recollection of what the Prime Minister said, and they had that recollection confirmed by the reports in the Press the next day, what was the use of trying to gloss over, as the right hon. Gentleman tried to gloss over, the real purport of the Prime Minister's statement? The Prime Minister's pledge went far beyond that of dealing with the particular argument he had put forward as to the unfair position in which the Minister in charge of a Bill was placed on the Report stage, and the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment now on the Paper went beyond dealing with that argument. But he frankly admitted that it was not so much with the merits or demerits of the Amendment as with the pledge that the Prime Minister gave that he was concerned, and nobody who heard his successive speeches would have the hardihood to get up and say that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, that his right hon. friend near him, and that he himself were all wrong in their recollection of what that pledge was.

MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said that he heard the Prime Minister's speech and the speech of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and he felt very strongly that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy was exaggerating very greatly what the Prime Minister said.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked whether the hon. Member did not hear the Prime Minister say quite distinctly that he was going to give the Members of the House the privileges on Report that they possessed in Committee. The right hon. Gentleman said so. [AN HON. MEMBER: "No."] He heard him say so; the right hon. Gentleman was reported in The Times to have said so, and he did not believe it was open to, or capable of, doubt.

MR. MCKENNA: The words are not quite that.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR replied that, in the first speech, which, he supposed, was the most operative one, the Prime Minister, after quoting the words of his right hon. and learned friend's Amendment, said—

> "That would give the House, in the case of a Bill considered upstairs, the power to discuss it as if they were in Committee."

Therefore, the Prime Minister knew exactly what the proposition said and what was the spirit of it, the spirit of his own definition, and he went on to say—

> "Without binding himself to the exact words of this Amendment, the Government were perfectly willing to accept it in spirit."

The right hon. Gentleman spoke at least twice after that, and he made no qualification of that statement. Why, even the present Government would hang a criminal on that evidence. What influence had made the Prime Minister go back on this clear and undoubted statement he could not imagine, but he ventured to think that it would be to the credit of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and in accordance with the best traditions of the management of business in the House, and of the highest traditions of Parliamentary practice and principle, if they retraced the step so hastily made, and did that now which only last Thursday the Prime Minister so clearly and explicitly told the House it was his intention to do.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said he was present in the House and had a conversation with the Prime Minister before his right hon. friend made the speech referred to. The Prime Minister referred to the speech which the Leader of the Opposition had made, and said to him that the argument in that speech had made a very great impression upon him, and that he found a great deal of force in it. Unfortunately the Prime Minister could not be present just then, and the Government had anticipated that this Amendment would have come on much earlier in the afternoon. He would, however, read to the House what was the argument of the Leader of the Opposition that had left an impression on the Prime Minister's mind. The right hon. Gentleman said—

> "I have had a long and painful experience of carrying controversial Bills through the House, and if the Committee will allow me I will explain exactly where I think the difficulty would occur on the Report stage. A Member gets up and moves an Amendment; possibly he may not be a very experienced Parliamentarian, not improbably he may not know the full strength of the case which may be made for his Amendment. Now the House always insists that as soon as an Amendment is moved or, at any rate, very soon after an Amendment is moved, the Member of the Government in charge of the Bill, or one of his colleagues, shall get up and say what line the Government mean to take upon it. Now, if the Member in charge of the Bill knows his business he will not make a longer or more elaborate reply than the case so far made in the House seems to warrant. He probably knows that a great deal more may be said in favour of the Amendment than has been said; but he would be foolish if he suggested these new topics for discussion. He always hopes (sometimes against hope) that the real importance of the matter will escape his critics, and he frames his answer so as to be adequate, but not more than adequate, to the case that has been made. On the Report stage, when he has done that, he has exhausted his right of speaking. Then somebody else gets up on the other side of the House, who makes the case which ought to have been made, but was not made at first. The attack develops along the whole line; and the unfortunate Minister in charge of the Bill, although by the courtesy of the House he is sometimes allowed to speak again, always speaks again under the greatest difficulty, because it would be very bad taste to introduce the smallest controversial aspect into a speech which is only made by favour, and not by right. The briefest indication of his real reply is all he feels entitled to give. It is quite true that in the case of a difficult Bill the Minister in charge has aids and assistants, and they can do something to help him, but I believe that difficult Bill can only be steered by one man, and that though the assistance he gets is very important, the responsibility rests upon the Minister really in charge of the Bill, who knows what has been said, who understands the temper of the House, who is prepared to make concessions, if they have to be made, and who knows how far they can be made without damaging the principle of the Bill. To limit that Minister in the extraordinarily difficult situation which may arise on a controverted Bill to a single opportunity of expressing his views upon each Amendment is really to put him in an impossible position. I would go the length of saying that if you are really going to send controversial Bills up to Grand Committees, and therefore compel them to be fully discussed when they come down on the Report stage, you must make an exception in favour of the Member, be he Minister or be he private individual, who is in charge of the Bill, and allow him to speak twice."

That was the contention of the Leader of the Opposition which had impressed the Prime Minister's mind, and his right hon. friend asked him if there was any objection to meeting that case. The Prime Minister said to him—and he thought that the right hon. Gentleman also said it to the House—that without pledging himself to any particular form of words he accepted that principle. [Cries of "In spirit."] The spirit was expressed in the words which he had quoted, and which the Prime Minister himself had quoted. The House was very jealous of strict faith being kept in such matters; but this was not in the nature of a transaction across the floor of the House. It was a voluntary statement made by the Prime Minister and was in no sense a bargain. What was in the Prime Minister's mind was that when the Report stage was reached on a vital question the Minister in charge was put to a great disadvantage by being allowed to speak only once. This Amendment was calculated to give the Minister or Prime Minister an opportunity of speaking more than once, and the Member who moved the Amendment to speak more than once. He very much regretted the absence of the Prime Minister, who had expected this question to come on much earlier, and he was surprised to hear what had been said about his absence.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yesterday.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said two right hon. Gentlemen opposite had used language which he thought they all knew that the Prime Minister did not deserve. [Some OPPOSITION cries of "No."] The hon. Member said "No," but the House of Commons was proud of the Prime Minister, and "breach of faith" were very ugly words. There must be two parties to a breach of faith, but there was no second party in this case. Although he felt very jealously for the Prime Minister, he believed that there had been a misconception in the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and he very much regretted that this discussion had taken place.

MR. LYTTELTON said that, as one who had a profound concern for the dignity and honour of the House and for good fellowship between the two sides of the House, which had considerably increased since the meeting of this Parliament, he wished to put one consideration to right hon. Gentlemen opposite. He and his friends were perfectly ready to accept the explanation which had been given of the intention of the Prime Minister; but the point was not what was the intention of the Prime Minister in his discussions with his colleagues, but what were his words used in the House, what was the impression he conveyed to the House, and what was understood by the House on both sides. The Prime Minister was most unhappily obscure in his expression and statement of his case. It could not be denied that in substance—for he did not wish to quibble about words—the Prime Minister promised that the House should enjoy the same privileges on Report as in Committee. Would any hon. Gentleman say that that was not a plain and reasonable interpretation of his words? He might not have meant it, but he said it.

MR. EVERETT: Most certainly he did not say that.

MR. McKENNA: I say that too; he did not quite say it.

MR. LYTTELTON said that the Minister for Education declared that the Prime Minister did not quite say it, but he said it in as plain words as could be, and it was so accepted by Members universally on that side of the House and by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy. Let him put the matter plainly to hon. Members. It was granted that the Prime Minister should be absolved from any intention to deceive the House in making that statement, and he absolved him from any breach of faith in the matter. But what was the position now, when the Members of the Government present knew in the absence of the Prime Minister that the words which the right hon. Gentleman used in point of fact had the effect of deceiving the Opposition? Knowing that, would they not make themselves guilty of a breach of faith if they persisted in the course of conduct which they were pursuing? A man might say a rash thing which he could not afterwards justify, but after the full consequences of the words used by the Prime Minister had been pointed out, and when not a single Member, even on the other side of the House, could say that it was not a reasonable interpretation which they placed on them, for the Government to insist upon taking advantage of that which the Opposition conceded as the result of the speech was to be guilty of conduct which showed that an attempt was being made to act unreasonably in regard to a statement which did in point of fact deceive Members on that side of the House. According to the best traditions of the House the Government ought not to persist in retaining an advantage so secured.

MR. EVANS said he was very glad that he was not in the House when the Prime Minister made his speech, and therefore he could not indulge in references to what were the Prime Minister's exact words, but he did very much regret that the time of the House had been taken up for an hour or so in bandying across the floor charges and accusations which in private life not one of the speakers would have ventured to make against the Prime Minister. In his opinion the House was not at its best when the Leader of the Opposition in a fierce tone and on an occasion of this kind threw out a charge against the Prime Minister, that he was guilty not of having made a mistake, not of a mistaken apprehension, but of a breach of faith, which charge had been repeated in a much milder tone by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. The last speaker had indeed said that, not only was the Prime Minister guilty of a breach of faith, but Members on that side were also guilty of a breach of faith in supporting the Government in their present attitude. He was perfectly certain that if the Prime Minister had been there and had got up and said that he did not remember the exact words he used, or that he did not think he used the words which were attributed to him, or that he was not correctly reported, or that they did not convey the impression which was in his mind, the whole of this discussion would have been avoided. His supporters who believed in the Prime Minister and were very much attached to his personality resented these accusations. It was, of course, a great pity that the Prime Minister was not there to meet the allegations which had been made and to explain the passage which had been mentioned. But surely it was enough for the colleagues of the Prime Minister who were in his confidence, and who knew the communications passing between one Minister to another, to get up and say in the House that the Prime Minister never intended to give such a pledge at all. He was quite sure that in private life, or even in the lobby, if a misunderstanding of the kind occurred, the moment it was explained that it was not intended to state what was then contended for, the parties would shake hands and there would be an end of the matter. That was why he was very pleased that he did not hear the speech of the Prime Minister, because it enabled him to bring an open mind to bear on the subject. He was not present when the speech was made, and, like the Leader of the Opposition, he hardly ever opened a newspaper, but he had heard the extract from the report in The Times read in the House. The Times, of course, was the newspaper which reported the Parliamentary debates best of all among the newspapers, and everyone would admit how marvellously accurate the reports were considering the amount of condensation that the reporters had to carry out. But The Times newspaper was not infallible, and from the report of The Times it was clear that the Prime Minister by using the phrase "without binding myself to the exact words" of the Amendment said he would meet it in the spirit. That being so he should have thought that what he authorised his colleagues there to state would have been amply sufficient to satisfy hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. He would like to turn the current of the discussion from that particular topic which was not decisive of any principle before the House. He regretted that the Leader of the Opposition had been unwilling to grant the Ministerial Bench the same adherence to political principle as that which the right hon. Gentleman himself had formerly claimed, and to stick up for the honour and influence of Parliament in the carrying on of business. He thought that the Amendment went too far, although there was a great deal to be said for the view put forward by the Chancellor of the Duchy. The Amendment not only gave a right of reply to a Minister in charge of a Bill, but it gave a great deal more. It made it possible that every Member should speak as often as he liked. He thought it was undesirable that a Member should be able to speak on the Report stage as often as he could speak in Committee. The tendency of late years had been to move on Report practically every Amendment which was moved in Committee, and the only difference was that Members could speak but once. He thought in the interests of business that to have the debate in Committee repeated on the Report stage, and to give the right of unlimited speech to every Member was undesirable.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN said he could not allow the speech of the hon. Gentleman to pass without comment. The hon. Member had made a personal appeal in regard to the acceptance or not of the word of a Minister of the Crown. No one challenged any statement made either by the Prime Minister or on his authority as to the intentions he meant to convey to the House. But the point was that the right hon. Gentleman did convey something different from the words that were used. The Hansard Report—a proof of which he had in his hand—bore out The Times report, confirming and corroborating it; and their contention was that if the Prime Minister used the wrong words and created the wrong impression the error should have been corrected on the spot. One of the phrases used was that—

> "The terms of the Amendment might be improved, but the Government were perfectly willing to accept the spirit of the Amendment."

Then the Leader of the Opposition pointed out that it was evident the Report stage would become the Committee stage, so that the misapprehension of the Prime Minister's intention was patent the moment that the right hon. Gentleman sat down. The statement was repeated by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy after the Prime Minister had left the House, but in the presence of the President of the Board of Education. Yet neither the Prime Minister nor the President of the Board of Education took the trouble to correct the prevailing misapprehension. The intentions of Ministers could only be judged by their public statements, and if these public statements gave colour to a false impression they ought to be corrected at the earliest opportunity.

MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) said, with reference to the contention of the President of the Board of Education that it was a rare thing for Members not in charge of a Bill or of an Amendment to speak more than once in Committee on a single question, that he found on referring to a volume of Hansard which he had taken at random—that for 4th to 19th November, 1902, and covering only a fortnight of Parliamentary time—that in the debates on the Education Bill of that year recorded in that volume there were three interesting instances of Members of the Party opposite speaking more than once in Committee. Those were the cases of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean (at page 162), the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (at page 434), and the right hon. Gentleman himself, the President of the Board of Education (at page 179).

And, it being a quarter-past Eight of the clock, and there being Private Business set down by direction of the Chairman of Ways and Means under Standing Order No. 8, further Proceeding was postponed without Question put.

LONDON PORT AND DOCKS BILL (BY ORDER).

Second Reading deferred without Question put, pursuant to the Order of the House of the 15th April, till Monday 22nd April, at a quarter-past Eight o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PROCEDURE).

Postponed Proceeding on Amendment to Question. "(1) When a Bill has been read a second time it shall stand committed to one of the Standing Committees, unless the House, on Motion to be decided without Amendment or debate, otherwise order, and such a Motion shall not require notice, must be made immediately after the Bill is read a second time, may be made by any Member, and may, though opposed, be decided after the expiration of the time for opposed business. But this Order shall not apply to (a) Bills for imposing taxes, or Consolidated Fund or Appropriation Bills; or (b) Bills for confirming Provisional Orders. (2) The House may, on Motion made by the Member in charge of a Bill, commit the Bill to a Standing Committee in respect of some of its provisions, and to a Committee of the Whole House in respect of other provisions. If such a Motion is opposed, the Speaker, after permitting, if he thinks fit, a brief explanatory statement from the Member who makes and from the Member who opposes the Motion, shall without further debate put the Question thereon."—(Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Which Amendment was—

"In line 10, at the end, to insert the words, 'Where a Bill has been committed under the foregoing provision of this Standing Order, a Member shall have the same right of speaking on the consideration of the Report of such Committee as if the Bill was before a Committee of the Whole House,'" resumed.

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) said he was perfectly amazed at the attitude of the Government. Outside the walls of Parliament this matter would have been settled in two minutes by the Minister in charge admitting at once that there had been a misunderstanding and that, of course, the Government would fulfil to the letter whatever they were thought to have pledged themselves to. If the business of the House was conducted on the theory it was professed to be conducted upon, that all hon. Members were honest men and honestly stated their views, Members on the other side of the House were bound to take the view that the Opposition honestly believed the Prime Minister had pledged himself to accept in its sense, if not in the wording, the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for the Dublin University. For the Government to stand up and say they were not going to give way in the least was a perfect scandal in Parliamentary life. He did not agree that this was not an important matter; it might not be important in point of time, but it was in the point of view of those who took part in debate. Nobody could say that such an arrangement as that of the Government was fair. Whether they were right or wrong there was a strong feeling on the Opposition Benches that the Government did not adhere very rigidly to their pledges. This was not the first time that they thought the Government had said one thing and done another, but this was the worst case because it was the clearest. Was it not better that the point should be conceded? Was it not a matter of vital importance that there should not be a general impression on the Opposition side of the House that the Government did not treat the Opposition fairly; that they did not stick to their pledges with the rigid and absolute integrity which the House had a right to expect? He ventured to hope that the division would not be taken under that impression. If it was, its effect would be felt for many sessions to come.

Sir F. BANBURY (City of London) said he was present during the remarks made by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy and those made by the Prime Minister, and there could not be the slightest doubt that when the Prime Minister got up, he made a graceful allusion to the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, and said he wished to make friends with the mammon of unrighteousness. He then said he was prepared to accept the Amendment standing in the right hon. Gentleman's name, and that he was surprised the right hon. Gentleman had made an attack on the Government when he intended to accept the Amendment but without pledging himself to the exact words. The interpretation always placed on such a statement was that the spirit and intention of the Amendment would be accepted. The proof of Hansard in the hands of the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer conclusively proved that the impression in their minds to-night was in the Prime Minister's mind. If, therefore, there was a misunderstanding, why did not the Prime Minister get up and correct the false impression that was abroad? Nothing then occurred until, after the intervention of two or three speakers, the Prime Minister left the House, and the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy got up and complained that the Prime Minister had given away his new Rule by accepting the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University. Why then did not the President of the Board of Education get up and contradict that?

Mr. McKENNA: It would have been out of order.

Sir F. BANBURY: The right hon. Gentleman could have put up somebody else to do so.

Mr. McKENNA: The whole discussion was out of order.

Sir F. BANBURY said that that was a matter for Mr. Speaker to decide, but many times in his experience hon. and right hon. Gentlemen had contravened the rules in order to correct a misapprehension. When he later on went into the lobby, and the right hon. Member for Dublin University was congratulating himself in having got his Amendment accepted, he expressed the opinion to his right hon. friend that the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs had put a spoke in his wheel; that the Government, having now found that they had made a mistake, would go back on their word. If the Government would only admit that they had made a mistake, they would at least show that they had the courage of their convictions; but they had refused to do that, and tried to make out that they meant something entirely different.

Mr. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) said that, having heard what was stated in the debate yesterday, he desired to confirm the observations made by the hon. Member for the City of London. It seemed to him that, if there was no Amendment of the nature of that which was now before the House, or none such as had been suggested in the name of the Prime Minister, which, he presumed, was initiated to carry out the pledge that they understood had been given to them, it was clear that upon Report there would be the same proceedings as took place now. If it was desired, in consideration of the Committee Stage having been sent upstairs, to give some extra privileges to Members upon Report, it was a most astonishing way of giving those extra privileges simply to give them to the Government and the mover of the Motion. It was taking away a constitutional privilege from every Member of the House. It was not at present possible for the Government, any more than a private Member, to speak twice on a Motion or Amendment on Report. But to give that additional voice and right to speak to the Government of the day was to his mind, instead of making a concession to Members of the House, doing exactly the opposite, and placing them in a worse position than they would otherwise occupy. He was one of those who felt exceedingly the way in which they had been treated. There was not the slightest doubt that they had all been led to believe that the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin was going to be accepted. They were distinctly told so twice by the Prime Minister; they all thought so; the Member for Kirkcaldy thought so. Now they learned that the Amendment was not only not going to be accepted, but that they were actually going to be placed in a worse position upon Report than they would be in if there was no Amendment at all. He thought it was rather a shocking state of affairs, and one which called for protest on the part of any Member who felt that statements, offers, or pledges given in the House ought to be carried out to the letter.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth), in moving an Amendment to the effect that the Rule should not apply to Bills referred to in the Speech from the Throne at the commencement of the session, said the great distinction between this and other proposals to except Bills from the Rule was that it got rid of the difficulty, which was bound to arise in every case, of ascertaining what the nature of the Bills was. The Amendment made the matter perfectly clear, and there could be no dispute, when it came to a particular Bill, as to whether it was to remain in the House or be sent upstairs. The Government proposed to except Money Bills and Bills of a highly contentious character and the most important Bills in the Government programme. But it would always be open to the Government to say of a particular Bill that it was not of a contentious character, and the Opposition would feel that the Rule was not being fairly interpreted. A Government generally tried to put its best foot forward, and placed in its programme at the commencement of the session those Bills which it claimed to have obtained a mandate from the country to pass into law. If those important measures were exempted from the Rule they would know exactly what business they had before them to discuss during the session. If his Amendment were accepted, the Government would not be able to send important Bills upstairs in order to burke discussion. He begged to move.

MR. REMNANT (Finsbury, Holborn) formally seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 10, at the end, to insert the words, 'Bills referred to in His Majesty's Gracious Speech from the Throne at the commencement of the session."—(Mr. Fell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MCKENNA said the hon. Member was mistaken in his understanding of the proposed Rule, because there could not be any acrimonious discussions of the nature to which he had alluded. It would be impossible for the Government to accept the Amendment. He pointed out that this year, in the Speech from the Throne, such Bills as those for the establishment of a Court of criminal appeal, the regulation of hours in mines, the Amendment of the patent laws, and the improvement of the law relating to the valuation of property were mentioned, all of which were very proper Bills to be sent to a Grand Committee. The Amendment would prevent their being sent upstairs.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) said the right hon. Gentleman had dismissed the Amendment in a somewhat cursory manner. He thought there was a good deal in the suggestion that at the beginning of the session Members should know what Bills were to be discussed on the floor of the House, and what Bills were to be sent upstairs. The Bills contained in the King's Speech might be divided into two classes, and classified as Bills of first-class and second-class importance. The danger, he foresaw, was that a Government overburdened with a programme of legislation which it attempted to drive through by sledge-hammer methods, might find as the session progressed that it would be impossible to complete its programme if all the measures of first-class importance were to be discussed on the floor of the House. To any Government in that position there would be a strong temptation to send up to a Grand Committee measures, even of first-class importance, which, according to the general practice, ought to be discussed upon the floor of the House. That danger could be obviated by the acceptance of some such Amendment as this. The Prime Minister had said over and over again that it was not intended to send measures of primary importance upstairs, and the House wanted to know what he meant by that.

MR. MCKENNA asked if the noble Lord could quote the Prime Minister's words.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY said he had not with him the quotation, but he would appeal to the recollection of the House as to whether what he had roughly stated was what the Prime Minister had said. He understood that the Prime Minister's words were "the important controversial measures of the session." He thought that expression of opinion by the Prime Minister ought to be embodied in the Standing Order. There was a very real danger that unless something of the kind were done measures which ought to be discussed in Committee of the Whole House would be sent upstairs, merely because the Government found themselves in a difficulty. He hoped they would have a more satisfactory reply from the Government on this point.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 11, at the beginning, to insert the words 'Provided that.'"—(Mr. McKenna.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford) said sub-section (2) of the Resolution which was now before the House proposed in certain cases to divide Bills into two parts, one part being reserved for the consideration of the whole House in Committee, and the other part sent upstairs for the consideration of a Standing Committee. As a Member of the Procedure Committee he knew that this was introduced last year in rather a curious way. It did not form part of the scheme of the Government as originally submitted to the Committee, but was suddenly, at a later stage of their proceedings, brought forward by the Chairman. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, when examined as a witness, was asked some questions with respect to this Rule which did not appear on the Paper, and it was then announced that the Government had adopted the Rule which was practically the same as that now proposed as sub-section (2) of the Resolution. He thought there could be little doubt as to the genesis of that particular rule. It was brought forward at the time the Education Bill was about to be discussed in the House, and no doubt the Government intended to press forward the new Rules in order that they might be able to divide that Bill into two parts, and to retain the controversial clauses for consideration of the Committee of the Whole House, while the machinery part was sent upstairs to be dealt with by a Standing Committee. Whether or not it was the intention of the Government at that time to apply the Rule to the Education Bill, it was clear from the discussions that there was to be a rather new application of the proposal. A few nights ago the Government had stated what in their opinion the application of the sub-section should be in reference to a very important Bill of this session, namely, the Territorial and Reserve Forces Bill. The Government had indicated that the whole of that Bill could, under the sub-section, be sent upstairs, with the exception of one half-section of one clause dealing with finance, which would be left to be considered by Committee of the Whole House. He could hardly imagine a more objectionable application of the sub-section, or one less likely to lead to advantageous discussion either in the House or in the Standing Committee. The House always heard two voices from the Government in regard to the construction of the new Rules. A few minutes ago the right hon. Gentleman had given his rendering, and shortly afterwards he had been entirely contradicted by the Chancellor of the Duchy as to the kind of Bills that were to be retained entirely in the House. The right hon. Gentleman had said that it was only small questions of finance or procedure that were to be sent upstairs for discussion, and that all other questions were to be kept downstairs. The Amendment he himself had moved in Committee in connection with this question was accepted at the time; but it formed no part of the plan of the Government. His suggestion was that if a Bill was to be divided they should insist on the principle of the Bill being established in the Whole House, only that portion connected with the machinery of the Bill being sent upstairs. In the Standing Order as now presented there was no suggestion of that kind—what portion of the Bill should be sent upstairs, and what portion should be retained. The only opportunity the House would be given for any explanation or debate on the Report stage would be an extremely short statement by the Minister in charge, or by the Member who opposed. Unlimited as the Government proposal was, he considered it a dangerous innovation, unlikely to facilitate business, or to lead to the good drafting of the Bills. It was, therefore, with regret that he suggested to leave out the words "provided that," in order eventually to leave out the whole sub-section.

MR. MCKENNA said that the addition of the two words, "provided that," was merely a drafting Amendment, and that they had been inserted to satisfy a suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition. As to the substantial question raised by the hon. Gentleman on the merits of the second part of the Rule, all they asked was to give the House the power of dividing a Bill, sending the less controversial portions upstairs, and retaining the highly controversial portions in the House. The hon. Gentleman had said that the power to divide the Bill was a great encroachment on the privileges of the House, but he agreed that it would expedite the machinery parts of the Bill if they were sent upstairs to be considered by the Committee. The House had already decided that all Bills might go upstairs with the exception of those stated in the Rule.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY: What Bills?

MR. McKENNA: All Bills with the exception of finance Bills. It was surely not unwise that the House should have the power to retain parts of Bills, and not be obliged to send the whole upstairs.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON said that these Rules were landing the House in greater and greater confusion. It had been understood that all Bills were automatically to go upstairs with the exception of Bills imposing taxes, or dealing with finance; but now they were told that the Government would say how much of a Bill should be sent upstairs, and how much should be retained in the House. The Opposition had asked that all Bills involving great national and imperial considerations should be retained, but the Government had continually refused that. Now they were told that the Government were going to reserve certain portions of Bills to be retained, or to be sent upstairs. So far as at present appeared, it was proposed to give the Government of the day a perfectly arbitrary power to decide how much of a Bill was to be sent upstairs, and how much of it was to be kept in the House. He regarded the proposal as depriving the House of the opportunity of looking at a Bill as a whole, and as likely to land the business of the House in great confusion.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said that the hon. Member constantly referred to the Government, whereas it was the House of Commons which decided the matter. All the authorities on procedure were agreed that the details and machinery parts of a Bill could be better settled in Committee upstairs, while those dealing with matters of principle should be retained for discussion in Committee of the Whole House. He maintained that of all the proposals there were none more important for carrying out efficiently the business of the House.

MR. FORSTER (Kent, Sevenoaks) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not consider the Amendment which he had on the Paper, to provide that the Standing Committee should not proceed with the consideration of that portion of the Bill committed to it until the other portion had passed through Committee of the Whole House.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER said that the Amendment to which the hon. Gentleman was referring was a separate Amendment, and he could not allow it to be discussed at that point.

MR. FORSTER said he did not wish to discuss the Amendment; he was only asking whether the right hon. Gentleman would make some Amendment of the Standing Order in the direction he had suggested. The matter was discussed before the Procedure Committee, and he thought they were all agreed that if parts of Bills were to be reserved for consideration in Committee of the Whole House those portions of the Bills would necessarily contain the proposals which were vital to the Bill. He thought, therefore, it would be waste of time if the Standing Committee were to be occupied in discussing machinery which might be rendered useless by the discussions in Committee of the Whole House. He did not wish to labour the point in view of the ruling of Mr. Deputy Speaker, but he hoped the Government would see their way to amend their proposals in that sense. He would like to make one other suggestion. An Amendment might be made in Committee of the Whole House which was inconsistent with an Amendment made in the Committee upstairs. He thought it would be some guide to the Committee upstairs if they had before them the result of the deliberations in Committee of the Whole House. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would tell them that an amendment would be proposed to meet these difficulties.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER said the matter had been considered, but he believed that when the experts and the officials came to deal with the question the Government were advised that it would be better to leave the matter as it now stood, and that if the hon. Member's Amendment were accepted it would complicate matters much more than if things were left in their present state.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) said they were obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for referring to this matter again, but he pointed out that if the machinery clauses of a Bill came before a Grand Committee, and the operative clauses before a Committee of the Whole House, it was not only probable, but inevitable, that the Committee dealing with the machinery clauses would insert provisions and make alterations inconsistent with the main principle underlying the Bill. He thought that was a fair case for consideration, because unless the same Committee dealt with the whole of a Bill they were bound to get it considered from various points of view, with the result that one-half of the Bill would be dealt with from one point of view, and the other half considered in another aspect. For himself he did not think that the machinery clauses of a Bill could be detached or divorced from the parts containing the root principle. The principle of the Bill and its machinery ought to be unified, and it was an exceedingly unbusiness-like proceeding to say that certain clauses could be considered before one Committee, and that others which had to carry out the object expressed in those clauses might be considered by a different Committee. He hoped the Government and the House would reconsider the question, because he felt convinced that if they did not, Bills which came down to the House under the new condition of things would not be satisfactory or coherent.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said it seemed to him that the proposal of the Government in this particular was open to the objection which they had taken to their suggestions on former occasions, namely, that it displayed extreme vagueness. The language of which they were asked to approve was most general in its character. It contained no definition and no direction. All they had to go upon on this occasion, as on many others, was a declaration by the Government of their intention and their view, but when Members on that side of the House desired to have those declarations enshrined in a clause they were always met with a mere negation. He believed a proposal framed as this one was, was unworkable, and that it would cause great embarrassment and must end in failure. He was grateful to the House for allowing him to speak at so late a stage of the proceedings, and it was a privilege to do so. But he felt very strongly that it was on the successful or unsuccessful working of these proposals that the excellence or otherwise of their future legislation must depend. This was not a Party, but a national question, upon which the whole working of the machinery of the House of Commons depended.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR F. BANBURY moved an Amendment to limit the operation of the new Rules to the end of the Session of 1908. He said that his object was to ensure that the new Rules should practically be only sessional rules. He had a precedent for that proposal. Whether the Rules were good or bad they would bring about a great revolution in the course of business and the procedure of the House. That was admitted by the Prime Minister himself because the right hon. Gentleman described the changes as being of a revolutionary character, and justified them simply and solely by saying that in his opinion they would facilitate business. He thought the House would act wisely if they accepted his Amendment, so that if the Rules did not turn out to be a success the House would have authority to terminate them. On the other hand, if the Rules were successful they could be re-enacted. He had a precedent for his Amendment, and that was the action of Mr. Gladstone in 1882, when he established the two Grand Committees to which they were now going to add two more. Mr. Gladstone gave many good reasons to show there was considerable danger in connection with the new Committees. One reason he gave for establishing them was that they would transact business that interested only a part of the House, and he stated that that business, and that business only, should go before them. Mr. Gladstone was most anxious that the business that had an interest for the whole of the House should remain in the floor of the House. That was quite different from the desire of the Prime Minister. Mr. Gladstone desired to set up the Committees as an experiment only. The very fears which they in opposition now had were those which Mr. Gladstone felt in 1882 in connection with a much milder alteration of the Rules of the House. While the Prime Minister was absent from the House the President of the Board of Education had told them that highly controversial Bills would not be sent upstairs. But the right hon. Gentleman also gave the House to understand that the only judge of what was a controversial Bill would be the Government of the day. He indicated that all Bills under these Rules, with the exception of money Bills, would be sent to the Committee, and that though the Government could send up highly controversial Bills, it would be in their power to keep them in the House. Therefore, the only safeguard the House had against highly controversial Bills being sent upstairs would be the Government of the day. He had every confidence in the present Government in so far that he believed they would pledge themselves not to remit such Bills to a Committee, but that was no safeguard against a future Government. In this connection he would like to quote some words which the present Prime Minister used from the Opposition Front Bench on 6th February, 1902. The right hon. Gentleman then said—

> "After all there is an old phrase which may sound a mere artificial form of words that this House is the grand inquest of the Nation. But really that does express the foundation truth of the duty of the House. This is no mere factory establishment; it is not a mere counting house in which demands on the public purse are to be checked and approved and provided for. It is something much more and much more important. For my part I will go as far as to say that the function of the conduct of business is merely secondary to the maintenance of those rights of which I speak. It would be better that this House should be less efficient in its transaction of business and should retain the full faculty of exercising the functions to which I refer than that should be diminished and that the House should become the most perfect legislative machine in the world."

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Hear, hear.

SIR F. BANBURY expressed surprise that the right hon. Gentleman should cheer that quotation unless he proposed to accept the Amendment, because the Amendment intended to provide exactly the state of things contemplated by the words he had just read; that was to say, to provide that the control of the House should remain in the House even at the sacrifice of what the right hon. Gentleman believed these Committees were going to do, namely, facilitate legislation. He begged to move.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.) seconded the Amendment for the reason that the Prime Minister had himself stated earlier in the debate that the very great change he proposed to make was of a highly experimental nature. If that was so, the right hon. Gentleman should treat it as an experiment and allow the House at the end of a couple of years to have an opportunity of either re-enacting the Rules or allowing them to lapse.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 11, after the word 'House,' to insert the words 'until the end of the Session of 1908.'"—(Sir F. Banbury.)

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said he could not accept the Amendment. He thought he could not do anything more likely to defeat the object they had in view than to put a limit to the operation of the Rules.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Tellers for the Noes—Mr. Whiteley and Mr. J. A. Pease.

And, it being after Ten of the Clock, Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the Order of the House of the 15th April, proceeded to put forthwith the Question on any Amendments and Motions moved by the Government of which notice had been given.

Amendments—

"In line 13, after the word 'provisions,' to insert the words 'and that;'

"In line 17, at the end, to add the words, '(3) Where a Bill has been committed to a Standing Committee, or has been so committed in respect of any provision, then, at the Report stage of the Bill or provision, the rule against speaking more than once shall not apply to the Member in charge of the Bill or to the mover of any Amendment or new Clause in respect of that Amendment or Clause'"—made.

The House divided:—Ayes, 359; Noes, 124. (Division List No. 127.)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Claude Hay and Sir William Bull.

Standing Order 47 read as follows :—Two Standing Committees shall be appointed for the consideration of all Bills relating to Law and Courts of Justice and Legal Procedure, and to Trade, Shipping, and Manufactures, which may by Order of the House in each case, be committed to them ; and the procedure in such Committees shall be the same as in a Select Committee, unless the House shall otherwise order : provided, that strangers shall be admitted, except when the Committee shall order them to withdraw ; and the said Committees shall not sit, after Three of the Clock, whilst the House is sitting, without the Order of the House : provided also, that any notice of Amendment to any clause in a Bill which may be committed to a Standing Committee, given by any hon. Member in the House, shall stand referred to such Committee : provided also, that Twenty be the quorum of such Standing Committees.

"In line 1, to leave out the word 'Two' and insert the word 'Four.'"—(Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Another Amendment proposed—

"In line 12, at the end, to add the words 'One of the Standing Committees shall be appointed for the consideration of all Public Bills relating exclusively to Scotland and committed to a Standing Committee, and shall consist of all the Members representing Scottish constituencies, together with not more than fifteen other Members to be nominated in respect of any Bill by the Committee of Selection, who shall have regard in such nomination to the approximation of the balance of Parties in the Committee to that in the Whole House, and shall have power from time to time to discharge, for non-attendance or at their own request, the Members so nominated by them, and to appoint others in substitution for those discharged. Subject as aforesaid the Bills committed to a Standing Committee shall be distributed among the Committees by Mr. Speaker. In all but one of the Standing Committees Government Bills shall have precedence. Standing Order 19 (as to irrelevance and repetition) and Standing Orders 26 and 27 (as to closure) shall apply to Standing Committees, with the substitution in Standing Order 26 of the Chairman of the Committee for the Chairman of Ways and Means, and, in Standing Order 27 of 20 for 100 as the number necessary to render the majority effective for the Closure, and the Chairman of a Standing Committee shall have the like powers as the Chairman of a Committee of the Whole House has under Standing Order 23 (as to dilatory motions).' Standing Order 48 read as follows:—Each of the said Standing Committees shall consist of not less than sixty nor more than eighty Members, to be nominated by the Committee of Selection, who shall have regard to the classes of Bills committed to such Committees, to the composition of the House, and to the qualifications of the Members selected; and shall have power to discharge Members from time to time, and to appoint others in substitution for those discharged. The Committee of Selection shall also have power to add not more than fifteen Members to a Standing Committee in respect of any Bill referred to it, to serve on the Committee during the consideration of such Bill.

Amendment—

"In line 6, after the word 'time,' to insert 'for non-attendance or at their own request'"—made.

Another Amendment proposed—

"In line 6, after the word 'discharged,' to insert the words, 'provided that, for the consideration of all Public Bills relating exclusively to Wales and Monmouthshire, the Committee shall be so constituted as to comprise all Members sitting for constituencies in Wales and Monmouthshire.'"—(*Sir H. TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir Alexander Acland-Hood and Viscount Valentia.

Amendment—

"At end, to add 'Provided that this Order shall not apply to the Standing Committee on Scottish Bills.'"—made.

Standing Order 49 read as follows:—

The Committee of Selection shall nominate a Chairmen's Panel to consist of not less than four nor more than six Members, of whom three shall be a quorum; and the Chairmen's Panel shall appoint from among themselves the Chairman of each Standing Committee, and may change the Chairman so appointed from time to time.

Amendment—

"To leave out 'six' and insert 'eight.'"—made.

And, it being after half-past Eleven of the Clock on Tuesday evening, Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Wednesday, 17*th April*, 1907.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House, That the Clerk of the Parliaments had laid upon the Table the Certificates from the Examiners that the further Standing Orders applicable to the following Bills have been complied with:—Llandrindod Wells Gas; Bude Gas; Falmouth Gas; Annfield Plain and District Gas; Gas Companies (Removal of Sulphur Restrictions); Simon-Carves Bye-Product Coke Oven Construction and Working Company, Limited [H.L.];

The same were ordered to lie on the Table.

Electric Supply Corporation Bill [H.L.] Examiners' Certificate of non-compliance with the Standing Orders referred to the Standing Orders Committee on Monday next.

Simon-Carves Bye-Product Coke Oven Construction and Working Company, Limited, Bill [H.L.]; Read 2ª (according to order).

Electric Supply Corporation Bill [H.L.]; Order of the Day for the Second Reading read, and discharged.

Tyne Improvement Bill [H.L.]; Read 3ª. An Amendment made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

Oxford and District Tramways Bill [H.L.]; Read 3ª and passed, and sent to the Commons.

Broadstairs and St. Peter's Urban District Water Bill [H.L.]; The Order made on the 18th of March last, appointing certain Lords the Select Committee to consider the Bill, discharged.

Glasgow Corporation Bill [H.L.]; Renfrewshire Upper District (Eastwood and Mearns) Water Bill [H.L]; Report from the Committee of Selection, That the Lord Clinton be proposed to the House as a Member of the Select Committee on the said Bills in the place of the Lord Faber; read, and agreed to.

Education Board Provisional Order Confirmation (London No. 1) Bill [H.L.] A Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Education under the Education Acts, 1870 to 1903, to enable the London County Council to put in force the Lands Clauses Acts. Was presented by the Lord President (E. Crewe); read 1ª; to be printed; and referred to the Examiners. (No. 31.)

LONDON GOVERNMENT SCHEME (SOUTHWARK BOROUGH MARKET) BILL.

[Second Reading.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*The LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL (The Earl of Crewe): My Lords, this Bill is one which arises out of the London Government Act of 1899, and relates to the Borough Market of Southwark, which was originally founded under an old Act passed in the year 1764 in the reign of George III. By that Act the wardens of the parish of St. Saviour, the overseers of that parish, and eleven elected inhabitant ratepayers were constituted trustees for the purpose of this market. To make a long story short, owing to various changes in local government, for instance the fact that overseers are no longer appointed and that their powers are vested in the borough council, and also owing to some doubts which have arisen as to the possibility of electing the eleven inhabitant ratepayers since the Act of 1899, it has been found necessary to form a new scheme for this purpose. The effect of this Bill is that the trustees are in future to be appointed by the borough council on the nomination of the councillors of the ward, which is co-extensive with the parish of St. Saviour. At first there was some opposition to this Bill both from the London County Council and from the borough council of Southwark, but I am glad to say that the objections have been entirely withdrawn and that the Bill passed through another place without opposition. If your Lordships will give it a Second Reading it will then go, in accordance with the new, and, as I think, very valuable Standing Order, to the Committee on Unopposed Bills, where it will receive due consideration. I hope in these circumstances your Lordships will give the Bill a Second Reading.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2ª. —(The Earl of Crewe.)

On Question, Bill read 2ª (according to order) and committed.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

The Lord Balfour appointed to take the chair in Committees of the Whole House this day in the absence of the Chairman of Committees.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH rose to move that there be laid before this House a complete list, with dates of issue, of the Reports of the Historical Manuscripts Commission and of the appendices thereto; together with an alphabetical index of the collections examined and reported on, giving a reference to the Report and appendix wherein the result of the examination may be found.

The noble Lord said: My Lords, the Motion which stands in my name will, I believe, be accepted by the noble Earl who represents the Home Office. It requires no explanation, because it is a Motion which has to be made from time to time to secure a continuance of this index. I have been in communication with the representatives of the Home Office, and I understand they are willing that the House should pass this Motion. In moving it I venture to make two suggestions which I hope the noble Earl will be able to accept—namely, that some of the volumes which have been already printed, but are out of print, should be incorporated with the Return now asked for, and that the Return when printed should be on quarto paper, the same size paper as the volumes of which it is the index.

Moved, That an humble address be presented to His Majesty for a complete list, with dates of issue, of the Reports of the Historical Manuscripts Commission and of the appendices thereto; together with an alphabetical index of the collections examined and reported on, giving a reference to the Report and appendix wherein the result of the examination may be found.—(Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, His Majesty's Government are quite ready to give the Return asked for by the noble Lord. With regard to the special points to which he has referred, there are, I know, some Members of the Commission who are in favour of what he has suggested, and I have very little doubt that, with their support, the Commission will give effect to his request.

On Question, Motion agreed to, and ordered accordingly.

THE SHIPBUILDING PROGRAMME.

LORD BRASSEY rose to call attention to the programme of shipbuilding for the Navy as proposed for 1907–1908. The noble Lord said: My Lords, before dealing with shipbuilding, I may offer one observation with which my noble friend will certainly agree. He will admit that he is not unduly troubled with interpellations from these benches. Noble Lords in opposition are patriotic. They are silent because they are satisfied with the general administration of the Navy. The supporters of the Government know that the strength of the Navy in men and ships is being adequately maintained. Where economy has been possible Votes have been cut down. No pains have been spared to perfect the training of the Navy. The manœuvres recently carried out have been on a scale unprecedented in time of peace. The advance in gunnery has been notable, reflecting credit both on the gunnery officers of the Fleet and the seamen. Better provision has been made for the instruction of officers in naval strategy, in navigation, and in other subjects. The education of cadets has been revised and adapted to modern requirements.

The country has confidence, and rightly so, in the general administration of the Navy. There are always points on which suggestions may be offered. Briefly, I propose to deal with shipbuilding. The relative strength of Navies depends essentially on battleships. Looking back over a long term of years, our battleships, whether constructed by Sir Nathaniel Barnaby, Sir William White, or Sir Philip Watts, have been always equal, and often superior, to the ships of even date laid down for other Powers. Our latest battleships are those of the "Dreadnought" type. They show a great advance in armament and speed, and also in size and cost. The building of the "Dreadnought" type is commended by an overwhelming weight of authority—by the naval advisers and the technical advisers of the Admiralty, and by a Report obtained from a strong independent committee of naval officers, shipbuilders and men of science. There is testimony perhaps even more conclusive. Ships of the "Dreadnought" type are being laid down by nearly every maritime Power—by Russia and Japan, by France and the United States. We have been the first to lay them down and have stolen a march.

There must always be need for some ships of less dimensions than the "Dreadnought." The cost of the "Dreadnought" may be put in round figures at £2,000,000. Such ships must be few. And there are operations of war which can be more effectively performed by many ships than by few. The forces with which a superior fleet may have to deal may be widely scattered. There are the tactical considerations on which Admiral Sir Reginald Custance has insisted—

> "No ship" (he contends), "however large, can stand up against the fire of two or three battleships."

There are the many risks from which size will not secure immunity. There is the risk of instantaneous destruction by the submarine mine, fatal to both sides in the war in the Far East. There are the risks of navigation. Casualties have been numerous in the British Navy. We have lately lost a battleship. It would not be well to build ships for the British Navy inferior as to calibre of guns, armour, speed or endurance. We may adopt the suggestion put forward by Sir William White. We may lay down a type in which the armament of two "Dreadnoughts" may be distributed between three vessels, equal in speed, armament and defence, and possibly superior in fighting power to the larger ships.

If it is difficult to produce a type of battleship which shall be in all respects satisfactory, the difficulty is greater still in the case of cruisers. In the endeavour to combine offensive and defensive power, speed and endurance, our latest cruisers have become as large and costly as battleships. It has been contended that as armoured cruisers come nearer to battleships in armour and armament, it will be difficult to limit their sphere of action to that strictly belonging to cruisers. In the line of battle their speed would give no advantage, while in fighting power they would be inferior to the battleships to which they were opposed. It seems clear that the Admiralty should concentrate their resources as far as possible on battleships. By adopting this policy the fleet of Germany has been created with estimates relatively moderate in amount. Our cruisers must be sufficient to meet those of other Powers. There has been no neglect in this respect on the part of the Admiralty. As against armoured vessels, the protected cruisers must be reckoned as non-combatants. They are necessary to protect commerce. The British Navy has, in this class, an overwhelming superiority.

Vessels are necessary for scouting duties. They are the eyes of the fleet. Eight scouts have lately been built. They are costly, but not satisfactory, flimsy in construction, weak in armour and armament. Speed is the only merit. The scouts are too small for ocean service. No more vessels of this class are being laid down. A new and enlarged destroyer, the "Swift," has, however, been proposed. The estimated cost is £250,000, or nearly that of the scouts. The building of ships of this class is, I submit, open to question. In fine weather their speed will only slightly exceed that of the ocean destroyers now building; and the estimated cost of a destroyer is half that of the "Swift."

In view of the failure of the ablest constructors, both in the Admiralty and out of doors, to produce an effective cruiser for scouting duties, the policy of subventions to mail steamers merits attention. After the close of the War of Secession the policy of subsidies to auxiliary cruisers was strongly advocated by the Secretary for the United States Navy. It was recommended later by Sir Nathaniel Barnaby, and approved by the highest naval authorities of the day—by Sir Spencer Robinson, Controller; and Sir Frederick Grey, First Sea Lord of the Admiralty. Similar proposals were renewed by Sir Donald Currie, and again approved by the naval advisers of the Admiralty—by Sir Cooper Key and Sir Anthony Hawkins.

The latest testimony to the value of the ocean greyhounds as auxiliaries to the Navy is that of Lord Charles Beresford, who appeared as a witness before the Committee on Subsidies. He urged that a reserve of auxiliaries to the Navy should be formed by the enrolment of subsidised mail steamers in our Admiralty list. The auxiliaries would be used to keep open long lines of communication. It is not necessary that all the ships on the Admiralty list should have the speed of the two vessels now completing for the Cunard Company. Extreme speed is most costly. At a comparatively moderate cost we may secure auxiliaries with more enduring speed than has ever yet been attained in vessels of war, encumbered as they must be with the weight of armour and armament. The policy recommended by Lord Charles Beresford has been adopted by all foreign Governments, by France, Germany, Italy, and the United States. It has lately been advocated by President Roosevelt. The British Navy is ill-supplied with auxiliaries.

The mercantile auxiliary offers a twofold advantage. In peace it can be usefully employed. Swift communications are bonds of Empire. We are at this time seeking with one heart to make those bonds, by every practicable means, closer. Action must depend on opportunity. New services have recently been established between Canada and the mother country. Others are being proposed. A liberal policy on the part of the Home Government in giving aid to such undertakings would be wise. It should lead to economy by removing the necessity for laying down special vessels as scouts. It would strengthen the Navy; it would promote the unity of the Empire.

*LORD ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, there is one remark I should like to make arising out of what has fallen from the noble Lord opposite on the subject of scouts. The whole practice of scouting has been altered by the invention of wireless telegraphy, and is now being worked out and studied on a totally different basis from what it was ten years ago. There is also the question of submarine bells which come in as a secondary method of communication with ships at sea. In consequence of this ships will not now require a large chain of scouts consisting of many vessels more or less in sight of one another, but considerably fewer vessels using wireless telegraphy. The demand, therefore, for scouting cruisers is less than it was ten or fifteen years ago. As regards the construction of smaller battleships, there is one point against putting the armament of two "Dreadnoughts" into three vessels, and it is that as your line will be longer you will not have your power concentrated so well.

Questions have arisen about the reduction of the Cawdor programme, and I think myself that that reduction was a mistake, not because the preponderance of the British Navy has actually been impaired by that reduction, but because it was a financial mistake. I was in Germany last autumn. The comments of the Germans sounded like a pæan of victory. England was showing signs of giving up the struggle. The feeling there, in view of that reduction, resembled very much the feeling of a jockey who, knowing that his own horse has plenty of running left in him, sees the only horse in front of him swerving across the course and faltering in his stride. He is thereby encouraged to fresh efforts. We have encouraged Germany in this respect to fresh efforts, and we shall have to meet them with corresponding exertions on our own part. I am afraid that, for every £100,000 we have saved this year we may have to spend £1,000,000 afterwards.

Though foreign programmes are important, what is actually being done in foreign dockyards is still more important. As far as I have been able to ascertain, the Admiralty of late years have been very watchful on this subject. A modern battleship requires so many persons to construct it that it is impossible to build it with any degree of speed without its being generally known. This does not apply to submarines and torpedo boats. The theory that Great Britain can build battleships so much faster than Germany, that we can let them have a start and then catch them up whenever we choose, is not at all accepted in German shipbuilding circles. They know all that we did when we built the "Dreadnought" so well and so quickly, and they think they could improve upon our methods, and build at least as fast if they felt themselves compelled to do so. At least six German firms undertake to build battleships, and between them they say they could put twelve battleships on the stocks every year; in addition to that there are the Imperial yards at Kiel and Wilhelmshaven.

Again, our method of voting Estimates is, to my mind, rather antiquated and unbusinesslike, as it exposes the country to a certain amount of risk if, when Parliament is not sitting, foreign countries start shipbuilding programmes. In that case they get a start of us. I think this might be remedied if the First Lord of the Admiralty had power, when any exceptional activity was noticed in foreign dockyards, to lay down fresh ships at once without waiting for Parliament to pass the Votes. A still better plan would be for both Houses of Parliament to pass Resolutions requesting the First Lord to do so. I think such a Resolution might be moved from one Front Bench and seconded from the other. It would not cost the country money in the long run, and it would lessen any risks to which we might be exposed. I venture to think that such a policy would be far better than waiting to pass Estimates on or about the 1st April, when they might be too late to achieve their object. I also think it would do more to check the activity of foreign countries in this direction than paper resolutions passed at the Hague and elsewhere.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord TWEEDMOUTH): My Lords, my noble friend who initiated this discussion has had a long experience of the Navy and of ships generally, and always speaks with great authority in this House. I was very much pleased to hear from him that he approves of what the Admiralty have done up to the present time. He approved of our shipbuilding programme, although he made certain suggestions by which it might be supplemented. Before I go into details I should like to state in a few sentences what is the policy of the Admiralty, for during the last four or five months we have been subjected to some criticism which did not altogether take into account all the action which the Admiralty have taken with regard to our shipbuilding programme.

The Admiralty policy is practically founded upon three grounds which I think are accepted by every Party in the State. In the first place, this axiom will be accepted by every one, namely, that our country must at all events keep the command of the sea, without having any regard to the cost at which that may be done. The second ground is that at the present moment we are in an unquestionable command. Our position is one which it is impossible for any one to dispute. I claim for the present Board of Admiralty no credit for that. It is the result of twenty years of various Administrations, and to them the credit is due. There is the third point, upon which, with a reservation or two, all parties will agree—namely, that the burden of naval expenditure is a very heavy one. There has been already too keen a competition amongst the various Naval Powers. On those principles we founded the present Admiralty policy.

I will not attempt to give the House long details with regard to the comparative strength of the British Navy and the navies of foreign Powers. That I believe to be an unnecessary thing, and a method which is unnecessarily agressive, and which may be misunderstood, by flaunting before the world what is our position as regards predominance. It is perfectly clear to anybody who will refer to the very many works published in this country, in Germany, and in France,—such works as the Dilke Return, Lord Brassey's "Navy Annual," Jane's "Fighting Ships," the German book, and an excellent little book published by the French. Anybody studying the returns published in those books will be satisfied that at this moment the British Navy is in a very predominant position.

Then it is said, "Oh, but at some early future period we shall find ourselves caught up by our rivals, and we shall find ourselves in a weaker position than we ought to be." I do not think there is any fear of that in the near future. In the course of the next two years we shall have nine big ships. We shall have the four vessels of the "Dreadnought" type, the "Lord Nelson" and the "Agamemnon," and the three big armoured cruisers of the "Invincible" type, all ready by the spring of 1909; and I do not believe by that time one single European Power will have one vessel constructed and on the sea equal to those vessels. The only Power that is likely by that time to have a vessel of the type of the "Dreadnought" is our ally, Japan.

The policy that we have adopted this year is to reduce slightly our battleship programme. I do not think that is really differing from the policy of those who preceded us. In 1904 and 1905 there were considerable reductions in the Naval Votes, and the reduction was continued last year. No doubt we struck off one "Dreadnought." That was thoroughly justified, because, at this moment, the new class of ship is still largely under trial. It would have been a matter of very great and unnecessary risk for us to have entered into a very large or a very long programme. The fact of the matter is that the programmes of foreign countries which are so often brought against us are programmes on paper—they are programmes extended over a great number of years—and it is not the view of the Admiralty that these long programmes should be adopted by this country. We believe it is a wiser plan to go on the lines that sufficient unto the day is the programme thereof, and that it is far better to have a programme limited to a comparatively short time, and then from time to time to change that programme, making additions to it if necessary, but not to enter into a long programme spread over a great number of years.

It is desirable, if possible, to put a check upon naval programmes throughout the whole world. His Majesty's Government have taken that line. They have endeavoured to show that they, at any rate, are willing to agree either to propose such a thing at The Hague Conference, or to assent to any proposals to that effect that might be made. So far as The Hague Conference is concerned, His Majesty's Government have distinctly said that, whilst they are ready to enter into an arrangement of that sort with other Powers, if other Powers are ready to discuss it, or to be bound by the decision of The Hague Conference, yet, if the other Powers refuse to do so, we go into the Conference absolutely unpledged, or pledged only to this —that if foreign countries do extend their programme, we, in our turn, will also extend our programme in order to keep our relative position amongst Naval Powers. I believe that to be a thoroughly sound method of action, and one that will generally commend itself to the people of this country.

I come now to some of the points raised by my noble friend. He began by arguing in favour of greater attention being paid to smaller ships. He suggested, as Sir William White has suggested, that our battleships of the future might to some extent be designed on lines not quite so big as the "Dreadnought." There are many things to be said on both sides of that question, but I should like to point out to my noble friend that we should not be able for the cost of two "Dreadnoughts" to build more than what is now represented by three cruisers of the "Shannon" class. If it is attempted to build three battleships to command the same armaments as two "Dreadnoughts," the three ships would cost a very much larger sum of money to construct than two "Dreadnoughts," and they would also be much more expensive to keep up. They would require more men to man them, and it is difficult to believe that such vessels would be of the same power or efficiency as the "Dreadnought" class itself. We believe the concentration of armaments on a big ship is very important. We believe the four great desiderata are speed, coal endurance, armour, and armaments.

The opinion formed by the Admiralty and adopted by all the other nations of the world is that the big ship, with its large number of guns, is most likely to be effective if it has the speed to make the best use of its armament. The proposal to go back to a smaller ship is, I believe, a mistake. For us, battleships must be of great size and speed. I agree that the designing of cruisers is a very difficult matter; but here again the whole tendency of naval opinion is that the big armoured cruiser is more likely to be of advantage in war than the smaller cruiser. No foreign cruiser, I believe, would be able to stand up against cruisers of the "Invincible" class.

I agree that the Admiralty should concentrate in future on battleships. Battleships must be the first consideration, and in these days battleships and big armoured cruisers must go very much together and must be worked on very much the same lines. As the noble Lord said, the protected cruiser is nowadays almost a non-combatant ship. Mercantile cruisers can be relied on very doubtfully; they must be extremely fast or they will not be able to escape from ships of more formidable type. As to the two great ships which the Cunard Company launched in the present year, they were beyond any others in size and speed; and, if any mercantile cruisers were capable of being of service in war, it would be cruisers of this type, with great speed and coal endurance. As to the power which Lord Ellenborough proposed to give to the First Lord of extending the shipbuilding programme of the Estimates, I am afraid that Parliament would not be ready to grant such a power. I am afraid we shall always have the duty thrown upon us of putting forward Estimates year by year, and of being guided by what is accepted by the two Houses of Parliament. I believe that the present programme is one which the the House might accept.

EARL CAWDOR: My Lords, I should like to say a word or two with regard to what has fallen from the noble Lord, because in some respects the statement he has just made appears to me to be of vital importance. As to the programmes of foreign countries, the noble Lord is right in saying that what should guide us is not the paper programmes but the work that is actually being carried out in foreign dockyards. At the present time, the noble Lord said, the strength of this country is absolutely measured by the two-Power standard, and I believe that the noble Lord is right. But out of the present shipbuilding programme one battleship is to be dropped and perhaps others, if certain things take place at The Hague Conference. I hope the negotiations at The Hague will come to a successful issue; but I note with pleasure what the noble Lord said with regard to what our position might be after The Hague Conference, and also what his view is, and I assume that it is also the view of the Government, as to the duty of the Admiralty in maintaining the naval strength of this country.

I confess—and I have stated it in your Lordships' House before—that statements have been made in another place by the Prime Minister which have given rise to considerable anxiety in the country. In discussing the two-Power standard, the Prime Minister said that although he accepted it as a rough and ready basis of our strength, yet to consider it as incumbent on us, if it referred to Germany and France, was almost preposterous. Such words from such a source were very alarming; but the Prime Minister went further. Later on he said that, assuming France and Germany to be the two Powers with which comparison was made, it was not to be supposed that we in this country could go on laying down ship after ship to maintain such a standard. I should have thought there was only one possible answer to that proposition—that those responsible for the Navy would have to see to the laying down of the necessary ships, ship after ship, in order to maintain our two-Power standard. Therefore, I hail two observations which the First Lord has just made as specially important after those statements by the Prime Minister. The noble Lord has declared that the policy of the Admiralty is to keep the command of the sea regardless of cost; and he went further, in discussing the possible action of this country with regard to The Hague Conference. He said that if other countries increased their building programmes and their works, we should build so as to maintain our present position. My Lords, I hail that declaration as an absolute assurance from His Majesty's Government that they pledge themselves, under all conditions and at whatever cost, to maintain the two-Power standard. That is a most satisfactory statement, and I accept it absolutely, as it is doubtless intended to be accepted. If the noble Lord who originated this discussion has succeeded in nothing else, he has succeeded in drawing this most satisfactory declaration from His Majesty's Government.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

[Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH in the Chair.]

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Earl of PORTSMOUTH): My Lords, there are no Amendments to this Bill, but I should like to make reference to a clause on which there has been some misunderstanding. I have had a letter on the subject from my noble friend Lord Falkland, and I desire to explain to him that Clause 8 does not in any way affect the soldier's hot meal. That is secured to him under the schedule of this Act. The object of Clause 8 is to give the soldier certain facilities in billeting.

*VISCOUNT FALKLAND: I beg to thank the noble Earl for his explanation, which is quite satisfactory.

Bill passed through Committee, and reported to the House without Amendment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Marquess of RIPON): My Lords, there are down for to-morrow only two small Government Bills which we propose to postpone. In these circumstances there will be no business of any importance to-morrow, and I therefore beg to move that the House do adjourn until Monday next except for judicial business.

Moved, "That the House do adjourn until Monday next except for judicial business."—(The Marquess of Ripon.)

LORD COURTNEY OF PENWITH: As I understand there will be an important debate on the Motion standing on the Paper for Monday, and that it will take some time, I desire to give notice that I shall postpone until Tuesday the Second Reading of the Municipal Representation Bill, which is down in my name for Monday.

On Question, Motion agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 17th April, 1907.

The House met at a quarter before Three of the Clock.

Land Drainage Provisional Order (No. 1) Bill; Land Drainage Provisional Order (No. 2) Bill. Read a second time, and committed.

Swansea Harbour Bill. Reported, with Amendments; Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS (GROUP E).

MR. MOONEY reported from the Committee on Group E of Private Bills; That, for the convenience of parties, the Committee had adjourned until Friday, at half-past Eleven of the Clock.

Report to lie upon the Table.

Taff Vale Railway Bill. Reported, with Amendments; Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

RAILWAY BILLS (GROUP 2).

Mr. Soames reported from the Committee on Group 2 of Railway Bills; That, for the convenience of parties, the Committee had adjourned till Tuesday the 30th April, at half-past Eleven of the Clock.

Report to lie upon the Table.

Kingston-upon-Hull Corporation Bill. Reported from the Police and Sanitary Committee, with Amendments [Title amended]; Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Cost of Civil Government in England and Ireland.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the total cost in the last or preceding financial year of the Departments of the Lord-Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary for Ireland; also the total cost under each of the following heads: Law and Justice, Board of Works, Local Government Board, Education; and the rate per head of the population in each of the five Departments, together with the total cost of Civil Government in Ireland, with the rate per head of the population.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The following statement shows the cost of the respective services, so far as they are charged on the Votes of Parliament or the Consolidated Fund, for the financial year 1905–6. The figures are taken from the statement of net cost appended to the Appropriation Accounts

	Net Cost.	Per head of Population (30th June 1905).
Lord-Lieutenant and Household - -	36,638		2
Chief Secretary for Ireland - - -	41,701		2¼
Local Government Board - - - -	68,618		3¾
Supreme Court of Judicature and County Court Officers, including Resident Magistrates - - -	270,414*	1	2¾
Public Education - - - - -	1,452,299	6	7¼

* Including £28,273 charged on the Consolidated Fund, omitted from statement in Appropriation Accounts.

For the figures as to the Board of Works I must refer the hon. Member to the Secretary to the Treasury, who answers for that Department. The total of the charges of Civil Government for Ireland in the year 1905–6, as shown on page 12 of House of Commons Paper, No. 278, of 1906, was £4,746,500, or £1 1s. 7½d. per head of the population.

Inspectors and the Labourers Act, 1906.

MR. DOLAN (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what are the qualifications for the positions of inspector, under the Labourers Act, 1906, and inspector of evicted farms; what is the procedure of appointment to these positions; and what steps are being taken to secure that all qualified persons will have an opportunity of applying.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) Inspectors under the Labourers Act, 1906, are appointed by the Local Government Board, and inspectors of evicted farms are appointed by the Lord-Lieutenant. In neither case have the qualifications for the appointment been formally prescribed. The fitness of the applicants is carefully considered when appointments are being made. It is open to any person to apply for an appointment, and a great many applications were received for both classes of appointment. I may mention that about 250 applications were received for the fourteen appointments of inspector of evicted farms recently made. As a preliminary step the three Estates Commissioners were requested to examine the applications and testimonials of the entire body of applicants, and to select those whom they considered most suitable. The Commissioners accordingly selected forty-two persons, and each of these ~~was~~ subsequently interviewed separately by a committee consisting of the Under-Secretary and the three Estates Commissioners, who went fully into the qualifications of each of the forty-two and formed their opinion as to his fitness for the post. As a result, fourteen names were unanimously selected by the committee and referred to me, and, after examination, I submitted the names of these persons to the Lord-Lieutenant as being the best fitted for the appointment.

Rateable Valuation of Ireland.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state the gross valuation in each of the four provinces in Ireland, and the average rate per head of the population in each province; and the total income-tax collected in each year of the provinces, and the rate per head of the population in each province.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I am informed that the Answer to the first part of the Question is as follows:—

Province.	Rateable Valuation (corresponding to the net valuation in England).	Per head of Population.
Ulster - - - - - -	5,479,814	3	9	3
Munster - - - - -	3,480,437	3	4	8
Leinster - - - - -	5,119,040	4	8	9
Connaught - - - - -	1,457,476	2	5	1

I have no information as to the gross valuation asked for. With regard to the second portion of the Question, the amount of income-tax collected in each province could, no doubt, be ascertained, but as the tax is collected at the source, and not from the persons on whom it ultimately falls, I do not see what useful purpose the figures could serve. In any case they would certainly not represent the true proportion of the tax paid to population in each province.

Exchequer Bonds.

MR. ANNAN BRYCE (Inverness Burghs): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the amounts of Exchequer bonds current on 30th June, 30th September, 31st December, and 31st March respectively in each of the financial years from 1896–7 to 1906–7.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.)

Employment of Soldiers by the Post Office.

MR. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.): To ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the fact that, on 1st August 1906, he received a deputation of trade union officials with regard to the civil employment of ex-soldiers, and then stated that he was not prepared to favour any proposal likely to weaken the ordinary workmen's economic position; whether he is aware that the Post Office authorities are now employing as telegraphists in London soldiers who are still serving with the colours, paying them 6s. 6d. only for forty-eight hours attendance; and, seeing that this departure is contrary to the statement made to the deputation and weakens the economic position of other men in civil service, will he order its discontinuance.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) The hon. Member's summary of my remarks is, I think, substantially accurate. With regard to the latter part of his Question I am informed that under a recent arrangement with the War Office a certain number of soldier telegraphists still serving with the colours are lent to the Post Office temporarily to aid in the reduction of season pressure at provincial telegraph offices. These soldiers retain their regimental pay, but as that is scarcely enough for their maintenance whilst temporarily employed by the Post Office it is made up out of postal funds to 24s. a week, which is a very usual rate of remuneration for a substitute telegraphist. Wages of 6s. 6d. a week are not offered, but there may probably be cases in which 6s. 6d. is the supplement added by the Post Office to the regimental pay. If any of these men pass ultimately into the permanent employment of the Post Office they will be placed on the same scales of pay as other established officers.

Qualifications of Irish Officials.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what professional qualifications were respectively possessed by the following heads of offices in the High Court in Ireland at the time of their appointments to their present positions, viz.: the registrar to the Court of Appeal, the Accountant-General, the present chief clerk to the Lord Chancellor, the chief clerk to the Master of the Rolls, the chief clerk to Mr. Justice Barton, and the registrar of the Land Judge's Court; whether he is aware that none of the following heads of offices in the High Court in Ireland ever practised either as a barrister or solictor, but were promoted from subordinate positions on the staff, viz.: the registrar of the Court of Appeal, the Accountant-General, the three chief clerks in Chancery, and the registrar of the Land Judge's Court; and will he state the reasons why men entering the Supreme Court (Ireland) service by open competition are considered ineligible for promotion to be heads of offices, while those who, prior to the passing of the Judicature Act, 1877, entered through patronage and without professional qualifications have frequently been promoted to these posts.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I have referred this Question to the Lord Chancellor, who has furnished me with the following Answer:—At the time of their appointment to their present positions, the registrar of the Court of Appeal was a barrister of over twenty years standing, and was promoted after many years' previous service as an officer of that court. The Accountant-General was a barrister of nineteen years standing, and had many years service in the Chancery Registrar's Office. The chief clerk to the Lord Chancellor was a barrister, and had served as an officer to the courts. The chief clerk to the Master of the Rolls entered the service by limited competitive examination, and was promoted after many years service to his present position. The chief clerk to Mr. Justice Barton was a practising solicitor when appointed assistant chief clerk, and was subsequently promoted. The registrar of the Land Judge's Court was a barrister, and had for many years been an officer of the court. Save where professional qualification is required by statute, persons entering the service by open competition are not debarred from promotion to be heads of office, but they have no rights of succession to such places, and in considering questions of promotion the possession of professional qualifications will always carry much weight.

Irish Chancery Court Appointments—Professional Qualifications.

MR. T. L. CORBETT: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can give a list of the posts on the Chancery side of the High Court in Ireland above the rank of first-class clerk for which statute requires that the occupants thereof shall have professional qualifications, and also a list of those for which statute does not require such qualifications.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Lord Chancellor informs me as follows:—Professional qualification is required by statute for the holding of the following offices, viz.:—Taxing Masters; chief clerks to the Lord Chancellor; chief clerks to the Masters of the Rolls; chief clerks to Mr. Justice Barton; Examiners and registrars in the Land Judge's Department. In some of these cases an alternative qualification of a number of years previous service in the Department is allowed. No statutable qualification is required for the holding of the offices of—Clerk of the Crown and Hanaper; registrars to the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and Mr. Justice Barton; Accountant-General; clerks of Judgments, Records and Writs. Legal attainments, however, are necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of these offices, and for a very long period the Clerks of the Crown and Hanaper, the Accountants-General, and the Clerks of Records and Writs have been either barristers or solicitors. The Chancery registrars were formerly appointed from the staff of the office, and had statutory rights of promotion, but the statute allowing this was repealed in 1867. Professional qualification, though not actually required by statute, is deemed necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of that office.

Superintendent of the Public Carriage Department and the Croydon Tramway Fatality.

Dr. COOPER (Southwark, Bermondsey): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the superintendent of the Public Carriage Department inspects the cars of the South Metropolitan Tramways Company; and whether any application had been made by the South Metropolitan Tramways Company for the superintendent to give evidence on their behalf at the inquest on Mrs. Wilhelmina Suhr held at Croydon.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The Commissioner of Police informs me that the Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative, and that that to the second part is in the negative.

Structural and Sanitary Improvements to Provided Schools—Spreading Cost over a Period of Years.

Mr. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): To ask the President of the Board of Education if he has received applications from any local education authorities to spread over a period of years the cost of structural and sanitary improvements of their provided schools.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this Question. A good many local education authorities have applied to the Local Government Board for sanction to loans to meet the cost of structural and sanitary improvements in provided schools, and sanction has frequently been given to such loans.

Supply of Milk in Workhouses—Precautions against Tuberculosis.

Mr. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if, in view of the statement in the Second Interim Report of the Royal Commission appointed to consider the relations of human and animal tuberculosis as to the amount of disease and loss of life, especially among the young, to be attributed to the consumption of cow's milk containing tubercle bacilli, and pending full consideration of the subject, he will consider the advisability of issuing a general order directing that all milk supplied to children in workhouses shall be boiled or sterilised or pasteurised, or subjected to some process approved by the Board, with a view to rendering it free from tuberculous poison.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The dietary order issued by the Local Government Board in 1900 contemplates that young children in a workhouse shall be dieted in accordance with the directions of the medical officer and with careful regard to the requirements of each individual child. In many Poor Law establishments the milk is treated in the manner suggested by the hon. Member; but, looking to the circumstances I have mentioned and also to the division of medical opinion on the question of the best way of dealing with milk for children, I doubt the expediency of issuing a general order on the subject at the present time.

Applications for Poor Law Relief—Case of Mrs. Gould of Birmingham.

MR. O'GRADY (Leeds, E.): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the case of Mrs. Gould who, being destitute and starving, applied to a relieving officer of the Birmingham Poor Law Union for relief, which being refused she attempted to destroy her life; whether inquiries have been made into this case, and with what result; and whether instructions will be issued to relieving officers that in all cases of female applicants for relief immediate inquiries should be made so that the necessities of such applicants may be met.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) My attention was called to this case, and I caused inquiry to be made with regard to it. I found that a committee of the guardians had carefully investigated the matter, and that they had censured the relieving officer for not having brought the case before them previously. It is the duty of a relieving officer on receipt of an application for relief forthwith to examine into the circumstances of the case and I do not understand that there was any failure on the part of the relieving officer in this respect in the present case. I may add that the officer does not admit that he refused relief to the woman, and in fact she was in receipt of it at the time of the attempted suicide. Moreover, the income of herself and family seems to have been understated by her.

Working of the Unemployed Workmen Act, 1905.

MR. O'GRADY: To ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether he has had a copy of the resolution adopted by the Leeds Distress Committee, stating that the number of unemployed as registered under the Unemployed Workmen Act of 1905 does not represent the total number unemployed; that unnecessary and irritating questions are attached to applications for relief, preventing many of the most deserving from registering; that committees are greatly hampered, both in providing sufficient permissible employment for applicants and in obtaining the necessary funds therefor; that there is a necessity for immediately introducing a Bill to amend the Unemployed Workmen Act of 1905; and that the cost of providing employment under the Act should not be dependent on voluntary contributions; and whether he proposes to take any action in the direction stated, and when.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have received a copy of the resolution referred to. For reasons which I have previously explained, I do not contemplate proposing legislation to amend the Unemployed Workmen Act.

Payment of Public Vaccinators.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether he is aware that the opinion is held by certain unions competent to judge that the minimum payment to public vaccinators under the Vaccination Act should be reduced from 5s. to 2s. 6d., and, whether he is prepared to accept and act upon such opinion.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have in preparation an order dealing with the subject of the remuneration of public vaccinators, which will shortly be issued.

Tuberculosis—Notification of Disease in Cows.

MR. H. H. MARKS: To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if, in view of the opinions as to the danger to human life from the consumption of tuberculous milk expressed in the Interim Report of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the relations of human and animal tuberculosis, he will now reconsider the advisability of issuing a general order to compel the notification of cases of disease of the udder in cows which are kept for the purpose of selling their milk.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The Report of the Commission is receiving our careful consideration. The matter is, however, one primarily affecting the public health, for which my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board is responsible, and with whom my noble friend proposes to confer on the subject. We quite recognise its importance.

Tenant Farmers and the Preservation of Game.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if his attention has been called to the resolution passed by farmers in the North of England expressing regret that, in the case of some estate owners, the preservation of game and the enjoyment of sport are made of greater importance than the tilling of their land and the well-being of agriculture and the agriculturists, and urging the landlords to remember that their pleasure may be, and often is, at the cost of their tenant's bread, and begging them not to make the tenant farmer and his interests subservient to that of the gun and the pheasant; and, whether, seeing that the resolution is the outcome of the treatment of several farmers who have recently been turned off farms they have tilled for many years simply because, under the new Act, added power is given to tenants regarding fixity of tenure and compensation, it is his intention to amend the Act so as to prevent such action in the future.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The resolution to which my hon. friend refers has not been communicated to us and we have no knowledge of the particular circumstances which led to its adoption. My noble friend is not, therefore, in a position to express an opinion as to whether further legislation is necessary; but, as I have already indicated, the working of the Agricultural Holdings Act of last session will be carefully watched, and we shall not allow the intentions of the Act to be defeated.

American Gooseberry Mildew.

MR. BECK (Cambridgeshire, Wisbech): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether legislative measures dealing with outbreaks of American gooseberry mildew in England will be in force by May next; and, if not, whether, considering that the disease spreads by spores from that month onwards, the Board of Agriculture will make a grant for the purpose of providing for a strict supervision of the diseased plantations with special reference to the carrying out of spraying and other remedial measures likely to prevent the spread of the disease.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) My noble friend has introduced a Bill giving power to the Board and to local authorities to deal with this disease, but it will not be possible to bring it into operation by May next. We have, however, issued a further memorandum, giving full information as to the best means of preventing the spread of the disease, copies of which I shall be glad to supply to my hon. friend. I am afraid there is no prospect of any Government grant being given towards the expenses of spraying and other remedial measures.

Scottish Marriage Laws.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): To ask the Lord-Advocate if his attention has been called to the fact that a general desire exists in Scotland for a system of civil marriage in registrars' offices, on lines similar to that recognised in English Law and recommended in the Report of the Marriage Laws Commission issued in 1868; and if he can see his way, in order to lessen the cost of marriage and to save the time of the sheriffs, to introduce legislation on this subject.

(Answered by Mr. Thomas Shaw.) My attention has not been called to this, nor am I aware of the desire stated. There are no proposals to legislate on the subject, but I shall be glad if my hon. friend will lay before me any detailed information in his possession.

MR. WATT: To ask the Lord-Advocate if he is aware that the omission in the Marriage Notice (Scotland) Act, 1878, to provide for publication of marriage where one of the parties is resident furth of Scotland has given rise to trouble and annoyance; and whether he can see his way to remedy this by legislation.

(Answered by Mr. Thomas Shaw.) The Marriage Notice Act of 1878 applies in the particular mentioned only to persons resident in Scotland. Any proposals to alter this would require very careful consideration, and I am not aware of any public desire therefor. In these circumstances legislation is not contemplated.

Superannuation Privileges of Extractors' Department, Court of Session.

MR. WATT: To ask the Lord-Advocate if he is aware that the Extractors' Department of the Court of Session was deprived of the advantages of the Court of Session Clerks Act by the action of his predecessor in office; and if there is any reason why that Department should not be put on the same level as the other departments and members of the staff entitled to superannuation.

(Answered by Mr. Thomas Shaw.) The Question appears to be based upon a misapprehension. So far as I am aware my predecessor in office did not in any way interpose so as to deprive the Extractors' Department of any advantages under the Clerks Act. The fact is, that under the Court of Session (No. 2) Act, 1838, the assistant extractor and clerks are appointed and hold office at the pleasure of the principal extractor. The rule of the Treasury applied to such a tenure of office is accordingly that they are not entitled to superannuation allowances under the Clerks of Session Regulation Act, 1889.

Assessment in Stirlingshire for Repairs to Established Church Manse.

MR. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that an assessment of 2d. per £, following upon a recent similar assessment, is being made in the parish of Kilsyth, in Stirlingshire, on proprietors who are Dissenters, and also upon Dissenting ministers, for whitewashing and decorating the Established Church manse; and whether, in view of the recent Resolution of this House that all ecclesiastical assessments in Scotland shall cease and of the provisions of the Ecclesiastical Assessments Act of 1900, notably Clause 3, Sub-section (2), of that Act, he intends to take any, and, if any, what steps in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) I have no information on this matter other than that furnished by my hon. friend. On the general Question I can only refer my hon. friend to the Answer given to the hon. Member for Aberdeen on the 13th March.†

Enforcing of Customs Act, 1842.

MR. SEDDON (Lancashire, Newton): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Commissioners of Customs are enforcing the Customs Act, 1842, in accordance with the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Goldsmith Company v. Wyatt.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) As the case to which the hon. Member refers is now the subject of an appeal to the House of Lords, the Board of Customs have not as yet departed from the practice which has prevailed for many years.

Tribal Fighting near Jamrud.

MR. REES: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he can give any information to the House regarding the tribal fighting which is reported to have occurred during the past few days near Jamrud.

(Mr. Secretary Morley.) No official information has yet been received on the subject. The Government of India have not thought the occurrence of sufficient importance to send a telegraphic report. The Malikdin Khel and Kumbar Khel are two sections of the Afridi tribe, who both occupy land in Kajurai, to the south of Jamrud.

Elementary Education in India.

SIR CHARLES SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for India if he can briefly state whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken to improve the quality and increase the quantity of elementary education in India.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) It is not possible within the compass of the Answer to a Question to give a summary of what has lately been done to extend and improve elementary education in India, but if the hon. Member will refer to the Report on the Moral and Material Progress of India for 1905–6, shortly to be laid on the Table, he will find a chapter in which the facts are summarised. I am not without hopes that I may be able to say something on this subject when I speak on the Indian Budget.

Conveyance of Local Correspondence between West Indian Islands.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, who is responsible for the conveyance of local correspondence between the various West Indian islands; and what steamship subsidies are paid for the conveyance of such letters, and by whom.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) Correspondence is conveyed between the various West Indian Islands, by such steamers as are available, at ship's letter rates, and also, up to the end of this month, by the inter-Colonial service of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, which has been for the last few months in receipt of a subsidy at the rate of £17,500 per annum, paid in equal shares by the Imperial Post Office and by the Governments concerned. Letters are also carried under contract by the steamers of Messrs. Pickford and Black under contract with the Canadian Government which receive a subsidy of £27,000 a year, to which the Imperial Government contributes £13,500.

Annual Leave, Travelling and other Allowances, of the Clerical Staff of the Admiralty Supply and Accounting Departments.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he will grant a statement showing the annual leave, the rates of travelling, subsistence, and other allowances, if any, in London, at Home, and Abroad, permitted to each rank in the clerical staffs of the supply and accounting departments of the Admiralty.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson). The information desired is given in the attached statements:—

Irish Jurors.

Mr. FIELD: To ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether, seeing that it is the duty of each Crown Solicitor in Ireland to procure on every occasion upon which assizes and quarter sessions are held a list of jurors summoned by the sheriff, and to make inquiries relative to the persons summoned, he will explain the nature of these inquiries, and whether they are always, or nearly always, made through the police, even in prosecution cases instituted by the Crown; and whether he will enumerate the various reasons for which a juror may be ordered to stand by.

(Answered by Mr. Cherry.) Each Crown Solicitor is left perfectly free and unfettered as to the persons from whom he should make inquiry as to the character and circumstances of jurors. He is directed not to inquire into the religious or political beliefs of jurors, but otherwise he is left to his discretion as to the nature of the inquiries he is to make. Crown Solicitors, I believe, rely very much on their own knowledge of jurors, supplemented frequently, but not invariably, by information supplied by the local police and other persons with whom they are acquainted. In answer to the second part of the Question, the reasons for which the juror may be ordered to stand by are: affinity to the person on trial, partiality, bodily or mental infirmity rendering them unfit to serve as a juror, or other sufficient ground on which a challenge for cause, if made, could be sustained. In all cases of peculiar local excitement in any particular town or district of the county, it is the duty of the Crown Solicitor, if the panel permit, to set aside all persons returned from that locality.

Borough Councils and Mounted Police.

Mr. SEDDON: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether borough councils are compelled to keep a section of mounted police, with or without consent of watch committee; if so, does it apply only to towns of a certain size; and whether every town in Lancashire, except St. Helens, has a section of mounted police.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) Local police authorities are not compelled to maintain a section of mounted police. This is a matter for their discretion, but I understand that in most boroughs of any size it is found desirable to make arrangements to have a certain number of mounted men when an occasion arises. I am informed that such arrangements exist in all the Lancashire boroughs except two.

Ventilation of Lobbies.

Sir BRAMPTON GURDON (Norfolk, N.): To ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will order the electric fans in the lobbies to be set in motion when a large number of consecutive divisions are expected.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.) This shall be done experimentally. It is not certain, however, that the fans are now necessary or desirable under the new system of ventilation recently adopted for the division lobbies.

Armour and Company and Army Meat Contracts.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether a contract for the supply of meat to the amount of $5,000,000 has been entered into with Armour and Company; and, if so, whether the traders in native meat only were afforded an opportunity to tender for this contract.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) No such contract has been made.

Annual Leave, Travelling and other Allowances of Clerical Staffs of Royal Ordnance Factories—War Office and Army Accounts Department.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will grant a statement showing the annual leave, the rates of travelling, subsistence, and other allowances, if any, in London, at home, and abroad, permitted to each rank in clerical staffs of the Royal Ordnance Factories, of the War Office, and the Army Accounts Department.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The information is as follows:—Leave—War Office—Principals and Assistant Principals, Clerks—Higher Division, 36 days; 48 days after 10 years service. Retired Officer Clerks, 48 days. Chief Examiners and Staff Clerks, (A) If promoted to Staff Clerk prior to 6th June, 1905—36 days for first 10 years in a Staff position, and thereafter 48 days; (B)

Men Employed in Government Ordnance Factories and at Woolwich Arsenal.

MR. BARNES (Glasgow, Blackfriars): To ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state the average number of persons employed in the Ordnance Factories in each year from 1884 to 1906, and the number employed at the present time, distinguishing the total numbers employed at Woolwich Arsenal.

MR. ROWLANDS (Kent, Dartford): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will state the number of persons employed at present in the carriage department, the gun factory and laboratory, and the total number now employed at Woolwich; and what were the corresponding average numbers employed for each of the years 1884 to 1906.

Disbanding of Royal Engineers (Militia) Submarine Miners.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): To ask the Secretary of State for War what units of the Royal Engineers (Militia) Submarine Miners have been disbanded since 1st January, 1906; and what was the establishment of each of such units on 1st January, 1907.

The Harwich Division - - -	60
The Humber Divison - - -	108
The Medway Division - - -	67
The Milford Haven Division - -	70
The Needle Division - - -	58
The Plymouth Divison - - -	83
The Portsmouth Division - -	82
The Thames Divison - - -	90
The Western Division - - -	103

Territorial Army—Physical Fitness of Men.

LORD BALCARRES: To ask the Secretary of State for War what steps will be taken to ensure that men enlisting in the Territorial Army shall be physically fit for active service; and whether men who, during their period of service, are reported as physically unfit, will be discharged from the force.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The manner in which and regulations under which men will be enlisted in and discharged from the Territorial Force will be prescribed under Section 8 (1) of the Bill. The Bill has not yet reached a sufficiently advanced stage to enable me to furnish the detailed information required concerning the condition of efficiency.

Closing of Coastguard Stations.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether any coastguard stations in Great Britain or Ireland have been closed during the past twelve months and, if so, how many.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) In the last twelve months ten stations and fourteen detachments in Great Britain have been closed; and fourteen stations and three detachments in Ireland.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Naval Manning.

MR. MURRAY MACDONALD (Falkirk Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how many of the total number of men voted for the effective naval service of the year are borne at any given time in ships fully commissioned, in ships with nucleus crews, on shore in barracks, and otherwise disposed of in shore establishments.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): The approximate number borne on the 25th ultimo was 127,277. Of this total 108,826 ranks and ratings were distributed among the four heads mentioned in the Question as follows:—In ships fully manned, 58,918; in ships with nucleus crews, 18,979; on shore in barracks, 23,403 (including 7,008 on the shore strength of the Royal Marines); otherwise disposed of in shore establishments, 7,526. The remainder (18,451) were borne in gunnery and torpedo school ships, training ships, etc.

Nucleus Crews.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that the Navy Estimates for 1907–8, on pages 12 and 14, omit for the first time the number of officers and men of different grades appropriated to nucleus crews, and include them with the ships on active service; and that this course prevents the House from making any comparison of figures as to sea service with past years; and whether he can state why the Board have deprived the House of this information as to the number of officers and men who are doing less sea work than others by reason of their being appropriated to partially-manned ships.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The alteration in the form of the Vote is due to the fact that, when the Estimates were framed, the details of the newly-constituted Home Fleet were not definitely known. The Admiralty have never had any desire to prevent the House from forming any comparison with past years, and the actual number of men appropriated to nucleus crews on any given date can now be given if the hon. Member wishes. I have just given, in reply to a Question from my hon. friend the Member for Falkirk Burghs, the actual number of men in nucleus crews on the 25th March, the latest date for which figures are available at the present moment.

MR. BELLAIRS: Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to include these in next year's Estimates?

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I will consider that.

German and French Naval Shipbuilding.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how many ships of the 1906–7 programme of France and Germany have now been laid down and ordered.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The French programme of 1906 provided for the construction of six battleships, six destroyers and twenty submarines; two of the battleships to be completed by the end of 1910, the remainining four by the middle of 1911. Although these vessels have been officially ordered it is believed that up to a few weeks ago none of the battleships had been laid down, and it is not known whether any of the other vessels have been yet commenced. The German programme of 1906–7 provided for two battleships, one armoured cruiser, two protected cruisers and twelve destroyers to be completed by the end of 1909. There has been considerable delay in the commencement of the three armoured units. The armoured cruiser is believed to have been only laid down in February 1907, and the keels of the two battleships, if yet laid at all, are believed to have been laid only within the last few weeks. Most of the smaller vessels were begun in 1906.

Tonnage of New Battleships.

MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the decision to make the tonnage of the three new battleships now building 650 tons greater than that of the "Dreadnought" was the outcome of experience gained in the trials of the "Dreadnought."

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The increase of 650 tons by which the tonnage of the new battleships exceeds that of the "Dreadnought" was decided upon in order that certain improvements might be embodied, and had no relation to any experience gained in the trials of the "Dreadnought."

Northern Nigeria—Railway Schemes.

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether His Majesty's Government have come to a decision as to the construction of the railway in Northern Nigeria, as urged by the British Cotton Growing Association and a deputation which waited on the Prime Minister on the 17th May, 1906; and will he say what is the distance from the River Niger to Kano, and the estimated cost of the first section of the line from Baro to Zungeru, and also the extension from Zungeru to Zaria and to Kano.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): His Majesty's Government have not yet come to a decision in the matter. The distance from the Niger at Baro to Kano is about 395 miles, viz., Baro to Zungeru, 125 miles; Zungeru to Zaria, 183 miles; Zaria to Kano, 87 miles. The estimated cost varies from £3,000 a mile for a pioneer line to about £5,000 a mile for a line completely equipped to deal with a large traffic.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): When will it be possible for the hon. Gentleman to make the statement on this subject which he promised me nine and a half months ago?

MR. CHURCHILL admitted that he was open to reproach for having led the House to believe he would make an early statement. He could only say that they were pressing the matter forward and hoped that when they received the report of Sir P. Girouard, who had been sent out to Nigeria, a definite decision would quickly be arrived at.

MR. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme) asked whether, as the route of the railway was practically known, steps would be taken to prevent land speculators reaping the benefit of the increased land values.

MR. CHURCHILL: The question of the land laws in Nigeria is being carefully considered with a view to securing for the Colony the advantage of any betterment resulting from the making of the railway.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): Is the line to be constructed entirely at the Government expense through the agency of the Crown Agents?

MR. CHURCHILL: The line is at present purely hypothetical.

Colonial Coastal Trade.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the recent Ministerial statements in the Canadian House of Commons on the subject of the coastal trade of the Dominion, the Secretary of State will inform the Canadian Government of the resolutions come to at the Imperial Navigation Conference in regard to the Colonial coastal trade, in order to ascertain the manner in which the application of the principles of these resolutions would affect the coastal trade of Canada.

MR. CHURCHILL: The questions discussed at the Merchant Shipping Conference all concern the local conditions in Australia and New Zealand, and the Secretary of State does not consider that the resolutions arrived at with Australia and New Zealand delegates affect in any way the question of the coasting trade in Canada, or that any communication with the Dominion Government on the subject is necessary.

Coloured Policemen in Crown Dependencies.

SIR C. HILL (Shrewsbury): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to recent occurrences at Nairobi, whether in most, if not all, of the Crown Colonies and tropical dependencies of the Empire, white settlers are liable to be arrested by coloured policemen.

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir.

*MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): In view of recent occurrences, will the hon. Gentleman take care that in enlisting white policemen for the British East African Protectorate every care will be exercised to obtain men of experience and character?

MR. CHURCHILL: Certainly we will endeavour to get the best men possible.

Poll Tax on Immigrants.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is aware that the United States of America have a well-organised immigration department, with several hundred highly-paid skilled employees, and buildings containing every requisite for the efficiency of the work and the comfort of the immigrants, and that the whole expense is paid, with a margin of £20,000, by a poll-tax on each immigrant of two dollars a head; and if, in the interests of economy, he will consider the desirability of defraying the expenses of the immigration department and making better provision for the immigrants by an entrance fee of 5s., which would meet all charges and leave a profit for the taxpayer.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): My Answer to the first part of the Question is generally in the affirmative; as regards the second part, my hon. and gallant friend will remember that the Royal Commission on Allen Immigration made no recommendation on the subject, and for reasons with which he is probably conversant his suggestion, though attractive, is impracticable.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Dover Harbour Board are applying to increase the poll-tax levied on immigrants by them, and that the Secretary to the Board of Trade held an inquiry in regard to it the other day?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, but that is only one of many considerations.

Alexandra Palace Betting Case.

MR. WATERLOW (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a case at Enfield police court on 8th April, under The Betting Act, 1906, in which certain men were charged with betting in the grounds of the Alexandra Palace, a public park, in which case the betting was admitted, but in which the charge was dismissed on the plea that the grounds were adjacent to a race course; and whether he proposes to take any steps by legislation to deal with such cases.

MR. GLADSTONE: I find on inquiry that there has been a decision by the justices in the sense mentioned by the hon. Member. I do not think further legislation can be undertaken, but I will consider whether the question of law can be raised in a higher Court.

MR. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, when races take place at Alexandra Park, travelling on the Great Northern line between King's Cross and Wood Green is absolutely unsafe for the respectable public owing to the number of scoundrels who attend the races?

[No Answer was returned.]

Scottish Emigrants.

MR. J. D. WHITE (Dunbartonshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will state what has been the number of emigrants sailing from Scottish ports annually for each of the last ten years, distinguishing, as far as possible, emigrants of Scottish nationality and domicile from emigrants of other nationalities passing through Scotland; and whether he can give any indication as to the number of emigrants of Scottish nationality and domicile sailing from other ports of the United Kingdom during these years.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): The figures asked for are too numerous to be conveniently given orally, and I propose to have them printed, so far as they are available, in the Votes. These figures relate to the gross and net outward movement of passengers, and do not specially distinguish emigrants for settlement abroad.

Hamburg Dock Strike.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can obtain from the consular authorities at Hamburg an approximate estimate of the number of English stevedores who have been employed there since 1st March.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: His Majesty's Consul-General at Hamburg reports that the total number of British dock labourers employed there since 1st March is about 4,500, but several hundreds have left again. I understand that the great majority of these men were not stevedores, but no information is available as to the actual number of British stevedores brought over.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR: Have these 4,000 men lately arrived at Hamburg?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not know when they arrived. They have been employed there since 1st March.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): How many of the men were discharged from Woolwich Arsenal?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I cannot say.

Imperial Navigation Conference.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can inform the House what resolutions have so far been passed at the Imperial Navigation Conference; to what extent these resolutions alter the existing practice in regard to the control of the coastal trade of the self-governing Colonies of Australia and New Zealand; whether any representations have been made to His Majesty's Government by British shipowners as to the manner in which these contemplated changes would affect British shipping; and whether any of the self-governing Colonies have put forward suggestions dealing with the possible loss entailed to British shipowners.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The Resolutions passed at the Colonial Merchant Shipping Conference will be presented to Parliament as soon as the proceedings are completed. Meanwhile, I do not think it would be respectful to the Conference to make any official statement on the subject. An authorised summary of each day's proceedings has been communicated to the Press. British shipowners are well represented at the Conference and have full opportunity of stating their views.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: Is that also a reply to the last two parts of my Question?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes, certainly.

Ladybower (Derbyshire) School.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether his attention has been called to the continued want of proper school facilities for children resident at Ladybower, Derbyshire; whether he is aware that these children, some of very tender years, are compelled to walk a lonely road in all weathers a distance of over three miles to Bamford to receive instruction; and what action, if any, it is proposed to take in the matter.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): Inquiries have been made as to the need of additional school accommodation for these children, some twenty-two in number, and I find that the distance to Bamford is between one and a half and two miles. The local education authority inform me that there is sufficient accommodation in the Bamford school, and that they are, therefore, unwilling to incur the expense of providing a new school for these twenty-two children. I recognise that the distance may be the cause of some hardship, but it would not, in my opinion, be possible to lay down as a general rule that a school two miles distant cannot be regarded as available.

† Excess of out-going over in-coming passengers.

‡ Excess of in-coming over out-going passengers.

MR. J. WARD: Is it not possible to find some means of conveyance for these children?

MR. MCKENNA: I think it would be desirable for the local authority to do that.

MR. J. WARD: Will the right hon. Gentleman suggest to the local authority that they might at least do it in winter time, especially for children about five years of age.

MR. MCKENNA: I will communicate with the local authority.

Llanychan School.

MR. BRIDGEMAN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if he can state what steps the Board are taking with regard to the proposal of the local education authority for Denbighshire to close Llanychan School.

MR. MCKENNA: The Board have suggested to the local education authority that they should defer their application for the decision of the Board as to the necessity of the Llanychan Church School until after the close of the school year which ends on the 30th instant.

Education Code.

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education when the Education Code will be presented and circulated among Members.

MR. MCKENNA: The Code is now in course of preparation, but I am, at present, unable to say at what date it will be laid upon the Table. I hope it will be very shortly, earlier than last year.

Royston Headmastership.

MR. BRIDGEMAN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether any directions with respect of the educational qualifications of teachers to be employed, had been issued by the local education authority for the West Riding of Yorkshire under Section 7 (1) (a) of the Education Act, 1202; if so, whether Mr. Milnes possessed those qualifications at the time of his application for the headmastership of Royston school; whether the Report of that local education authority, as to the educational grounds on which consent to his appointment was withheld by that authority, is corroborated in any single respect by the Reports of the inspector of the Board of Education; and whether he will consider the desirability of publishing the Reports of the local authority and of the Board's inspector.

MR. MCKENNA: I have no information as to the first two paragraphs of the hon. Member's Question. His Majesty's Inspector does not concur in the view which the local education authority have taken of Mr. Milnes' educational unfitness for the post. As I stated on Monday, I doubt whether, in the interests of the teacher, it is desirable to publish the Report which the Board have received from the West Riding County Council upon his teaching capacity, but as the hon. Member presses for it I will lay copies of both Reports upon the Table.

The Chantry Trust.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will consider the propriety of modifying or withdrawing the Treasury letter of 11th November, 1898, addressed to the Trustees of the National Gallery, so as to give the latter the power of refusing to exhibit such pictures purchased out of the funds of the Chantry Trust which they may consider unsuitable for this purpose, and also of eliminating from the Gallery such undesirable pictures as are already there; and, if the Treasury cannot adopt either of these courses, is it prepared to take any steps to restore to the Trustees of the National Gallery complete control over the pictures exhibited in their Gallery which they now share with the Chantry Trustees.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury): The Treasury letter referred to having been written under legal advice, I do not see my way to suggest any modification of it. I am not aware that, when the Chantry pictures have once been handed over to the National Gallery Trustees, any further control over them is either claimed or exercised by the Chantry Trustees.

MR. MIDDLEMORE: May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether, if adequate proposals were to come from this side of the House so that a measure could be treated as non-contentious, he would be prepared to introduce a Bill to reform the Chantry Trust?

MR. RUNCIMAN: So far as I am informed, no Bill for the reform of the Chantry Trust would be likely to pass through this House unopposed. If the hon. Gentleman would let me know the nature of the proposals he would like to see brought forward, I would, of course, give them my consideration.

MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby): Will the Government consider the advisability of carrying out the recommendations of the Lords' Committee on the Chantry Trust of 1904, a good many of which would not need legislation?

MR. RUNCIMAN: If my hon. friend will put any points before me I will consider them.

Sandford Wills Estate, Queen's County.

MR. MEEHAN (Queen's County, Leix): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants on the Sandford Wills estate, Garryglass, Queen's County, have signed agreements for the purchase of their holdings; that up to the time of the sale there were 300 acres of untenanted land on the estate, from forty-five acres of which a tenant named John Delany had been evicted; and that, on the eve of the sale, the agent divided the untenanted land between four persons already in possession of large farms varying from eighty-six acres to 400 acres, three being non-resident in the district, one living in Canada and his farms in Ireland let for eleven months grazing; and whether, seeing that 150 acres of untenanted land is good tillage, suitable for allotment amongst tenants of uneconomic holdings on the estate, some of whom are under £5 valuation, and nearly all of whom have to cart manure from four to seven miles to plant green crops which their own farms are not able to grow, steps will be taken to acquire this land for division amongst the tenants of uneconomic holdings on the estate.

I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that John Delany was evicted from a holding of forty-five acres on the Sandford Wills estate, Garryglass, Queen's County, and that the holding was taken by Joseph Dobbes, of Abbeyleix, who is a large trader, clerk of petty sessions, proprietor of a loan bank, and occupier of about 500 acres of land in the baronies of Cullinagh and Portnahinch, Queen's County; and whether, in view of the objects of the Act of 1903 the Estates Commissioners will, under the circumstances, refuse to sanction the sale to Joseph Dobbes.

I beg further to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the contemplated sale of the Sandford Wills estate, Garryglass, Queen's County, the Estates Commissioners can declare only the tenanted portion of the estate, with a view to refusing to recognise the tenancies created since 1901, and of acquiring the untenanted land for division amongst the occupiers of uneconomic holdings on the estate; and, if so, whether he will instruct the Estates Commissioners to act accordingly.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): Thirty purchase agreements in respect of the estate mentioned were lodged with the Estates Commissioners in February, 1905. In five of the cases the tenancies were created subsequent to January, 1901, one of these being the case of an evicted tenant who has been reinstated. The area of the land comprised in the four other cases is about 230 acres, and the Commissioners directed their inspector, when investigating the matter, to inquire whether this area could be acquired for the enlargement of the small holdings on the estate. The Commissioners have since received their inspector's report and will shortly deal with it, when the facts alleged in the Questions will receive their consideration. The Commissioners have received no application from John Delany, but will consider his case when dealing with the matter.

Irish Land Purchase—Inspection of Estates.

Mr. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if it is the practice of the Land Judge's Court in Ireland to sell estates and order the advance of public money to the owners or mortgagees without any official inspection for value or for security; if, in some of these cases, the purchasers are non-judicial tenants who have been excluded from the Land Courts by reason of holding on court leases at rents never judicially revised; and, if it is in the power of the Irish Executive to have estates sold in that court officially valued before the money is advanced, will he have this done in the interests of the purchasers and of the State.

Mr. BIRRELL: The hon. Member is under a misapprehension. The Land Judge has no jurisdiction to order advances under the Land Purchase Acts. Every intending purchaser in the Land Judge's Court has to make application to the Land Commission for an advance, and when the applicant is a non-judicial tenant, it is, I understand, the practice of the Commissioners to have the holding inspected before sanctioning the advance.

Suggested Committee of Financial Experts.

Mr. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the sum of money involved and the consequences to the Irish people, he will appoint a small committee of independent and impartial financial experts, with suitable actuarial assistance, to test the financial soundness of paying vendors, under the Land Act of 1903, without ascertaining the value of the thing they sell, an average of six and a half years purchase more than the average prices under the Acts which required the value to be ascertained by inspection, together with a bonus inflated proportionally with this inflated price, and also to test the financial soundness of the model calculation appearing on page 7 of the last Annual Report of the Estates Commissioners.

Mr. BIRRELL: The suggestion of the Question appears to be that purchasers are paying too much for their holdings, and upon this point I would remind the hon. Member of my predecessor's reply to his Question of 27th March, 1906, namely, that it is reasonable to suppose that purchasers have found it to their advantage, in free bargains, to pay the price they have given under the Act of 1903, and that nothing has occurred to show that the amounts so advanced are not secured.

Mr. GINNELL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my Question as to the appointment of a Committee of experts.

Mr. BIRRELL: I do not think I am in a position at present to advise the appointment of such a Committee.

Uneconomic Holdings as Security for Advances.

Mr. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the opinion of the Estates Commissioners that uneconomic holdings in Ireland, the rents of which have been paid out of money earned in other countries, are bad security for advances calculated upon those rents; whether his attention has been called to the number of such holdings now being sold without inspection, while neighbouring untenanted land is not sold; and whether he proposes to find any remedy for proceedings for which those charged with the administration of the Land Act of 1903 decline to accept responsibility.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have not expressed the opinion attributed to them in the Question. The hon. Member knows that no inspection is necessary in the case of advances for the purchase of holdings which come within the terms of Section 1 of the Act of 1903. I am not aware that those who are charged with the administration of the Act have declined to accept the responsibility which rests upon them.

Barnmeen (County Down) School.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland with reference to the necessity for school accommodation at Barnmeen, county Down, whether the Commissioners of National Education are aware that no other site is available, than that suggested by the manager; and, seeing that the rule of the three-mile limit has only recently been laid down, and having regard to the injury accruing from the present accommodation to the eyesight and general health of pupils and teachers and to the cause of education in the district, the Board will now reconsider their decision.

MR. BIRRELL: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that they are not aware whether any site other than that selected by the manager is available for building a new school at Barnmeen, nor does the Question appear to be relevant seeing that the Commissioners refused the manager's application for a building grant, not on account of the site, but upon the ground that there are already other schools within three miles of the place. The rule as to the three-mile limit referred to in my former answer is not a new rule, but has, the Commissioners inform me, been in operation for many years. The Commissioners do not see any sufficient reason for reconsidering their decision.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this school is two-and-a-half miles distant? Do not the Commissioners reserve to themselves the power to dispense with the rule under special circumstances, and has the right hon. Gentleman received a copy of a resolution passed at a public meeting of the people of the district claiming that there are special circumstances in this case?

MR. BIRRELL: I am well aware that the application of such a rule as this is always unpopular in the district affected by it, and I am sorry to see children under an obligation to go such long distances as even the one-and-three-quarter miles in this case, but I do not think that, even if I had the power I could in this case interfere with the discretion of the Commissioners.

MR. MACVEAGH: The distance was measured last week and found to be two-and-a-half miles.

MR. BIRRELL: At any rate it is well within the limit.

Unlawful Assembly at Athenry.

MR. P. A. MCHUGH (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he is aware that persons charged at Athenry with unlawful assembly were recently sentenced by a stipendiary magistrate named Gardiner to three months imprisonment each; will he say in what court of justice were the accused persons tried; how was the court constituted, and under what statute was a sentence of three months imprisonment imposed; are the accused persons still in prison; and what action the Irish Government propose to take in reference to this matter.

MR. BIRRELL: The five persons referred to formed part of a crowd who, with drum beating and horn blowing, were proceeding to the houses of some graziers in the neighbourhood of Athenry on the night of the 4th of April. The police, believing that the object of the crowd was to intimidate the graziers, intercepted them; and the sergeant in charge, by striking matches, as the night was very dark, was able to identify the five persons referred to as being the ringleaders. After considerable difficulty he persuaded the crowd to disperse. The five persons referred to were arrested on the following day on warrants granted by the resident magistrate, who on their production before him, ordered them to give bail for good behaviour in their own recognisances of £20 with two securities of £10 each. The magistrate on this occasion sat in the police station. In this case the police seem to have acted very well indeed in inducing the crowd to disperse. The resident magistrate constituted the court, and the proceedings were taken under the statute of 34 Edward III., and the magistrate's Commission of the Peace. On a review of the proceedings, the order of three months imprisonment seemed to me to have gone beyond the necessities of the case, seeing that there was no actual breach of the peace and that the efforts of the police were successful. I have therefore been able to recommend to the Lord-Lieutenant that the prisoners should be released at the end of fifteen days, which will expire on Friday.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has considered the desirability in a case of this kind of proceeding under what may fairly be called the ordinary law, and not under an old statute of Edward III?

Mr. BIRRELL: I can assure the hon. Member that I very much prefer to proceed under the ordinary law at the sessions or assizes rather than invoke the assistance of this statute, but necessities of a case may sometimes arise in which proceedings of this sort may be thought to be more necessary—only in very limited parts of the country. I am glad that in most parts of the country the ordinary law suffices, but there are one or two parts where it is difficult to secure the prevention of intimidatory acts. I only hope that it may not be found necessary to employ this statute again, but in this particular case, having regard to the reduction of sentences to fifteen days, I cannot say I think injustice has been done.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he does not think that respect for law in Ireland would be more promoted if he proceeded under the ordinary law and not under this statute, and whether he personally was consulted as head of the executive, as to the course to be taken in this case?

Mr. BIRRELL: I make myself responsible.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: Oh, I know that.

Mr. BIRRELL: I do not wish in any way to separate myself from the action of the authorities, but the hon. and learned Member can rely upon the desire of the Government to have all cases tried in accordance with the ordinary law, but at the same time there may be circumstances in which it is thought the ordinary law is not sufficient to meet the justice of the case, and although I hope the occasion may never occur again, still there may be circumstances in which it would arise.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: I gather from that Answer that the right hon. Gentleman was not personally consulted. Will the right hon. Gentleman give instructions that before this ancient law is put in force again, the matter shall be referred to him?

Mr. BIRRELL: The hon. Member must leave me to exercise my own discretion, but he must thoroughly understand that I am most anxious to be involved in all that is going on in Ireland.

Mr. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that these people were on the public road going in the direction of their own homes and that there is no grazier living within 300 yards of the public road?

Mr. BIRRELL: I have had the report of the police upon this case; the graziers' houses are in the vicinity.

Mr. ROCHE: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire whether my statement that there are no graziers living within 300 yards of the road is correct?

Mr. BIRRELL said he would.

Alleged Dynamite Outrage at Cloghroe.

Captain CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Royal Irish Constabulary authorities have yet ascertained if a dynamite outrage was recently perpetrated near Cloghroe, in the Parliamentary division of Mid-Cork.

Mr. BIRRELL: The police authorities have carefully investigated this case, and have come to the conclusion that no explosion, either by dynamite or any other agency, took place.

Agrarian Outrages in King's County.

Captain CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the number of cases of burnings of residences, stables, offices, houses, animals and fodder which have occurred in King's County within the last six months; how many persons have been convicted in connection with these cases; how many claims for compensation have been lodged, and the amount in each case; whether, in every case of incendiarism, the property belonged to Protestants; and whether he has any information showing that these cases were the outcome of the propaganda of the United Irish League.

Mr. BIRRELL: The police have reported four such cases as having occurred in King's County within the past six months. No conviction has been had. Claims for compensation have been made in each case, the amounts claimed being £15, £40, £200, and £2,040 respectively. In the two first-named cases £10 and £25 respectively have been awarded; the other cases have not yet been decided. The property burnt belonged to a Protestant in one case only. The Inspector-General informs me that he is aware of no grounds for suggesting that these cases were the outcome of the propaganda of the United Irish League.

Mr. HAVILAND BURKE (King's County, Tullamore) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that public attention had been called by the King's County County Council and other local bodies, to the fires and other injuries to property, malicious in some cases and accidental in others, caused by tramps in no way connected with the county, and whether he would cause instructions to be issued to the constabulary with a view to preventing the classification of such outrages as agrarian outrages, and also whether it was brought to his notice that County Court Judge Curran at the last quarter sessions spoke in praise of the general condition of the county.

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order. The hon. Member seems to have a long list of Questions. I think he ought to put some of them down.

Mr. REDDY (King's County, Birr) asked how many of the cases reported as malicious had been withdrawn in the King's County, and whether it was not a fact that Mr. Goodbody, a well-known Protestant gentleman, was not a member of the council, and whether the Member for the Tullamore division was not also a Protestant?

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order. The same observation applies to the hon. Member's Questions.

Mr. REDDY said it was scandalous that such reflections should be sought to be made upon the county.

Ardagh Police Hut.

Captain CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will say why a police hut for the accommodation of ten men of the Royal Irish Constabulary is in course of erection on a farm in the occupation of a man named Keane, being a portion of Crannagh Farm, Ardagh, in North Mayo.

Mr. BIRRELL: The police hut in question has been erected on the portion of the Crannagh farm which has been taken on lease by John Haire (not Keane). The hut has been built because the police authorities consider it necessary to afford protection to Haire, and the place is remote from a police station. The hut is occupied by five men.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): Why is it considered necessary to afford this protection; against what sort of injury is the police hut to protect?

Mr. BIRRELL: First I am asked if protection will be given, and then I am asked why.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG: Yes, I want to know why it is considered necessary.

Mr. BIRRELL: Then I can only repeat the Answer to the original Question. The police authorities tell me the person in question has not been boycotted, but there has been some provocation.

St. Patrick Celebration at Armagh.

Captain CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the statement of Mr. James Donnelly, of Armagh, on 19th March last, to the effect that the Ancient Order of Hibernians had the men and the guns and only wanted powder and shot to blow English rule out of Ireland, and if he has any information to show whether this body has imported any large quantity of arms for the purpose indicated since the dropping of the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act; and what steps, if any, he is taking in the matter.

Mr. BIRRELL: According to a local newspaper report Mr. Donnelly made a statement to the effect mentioned in the Question at a meeting on 18th March. The meeting was in commemoration of St. Patrick, and the somewhat intemperate language used by Mr. Donnelly may be accounted for by the festivities usually associated with the occasion. The police authorities have no information which would go to support the hon. Member's suggestion as to the importation of arms.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: The hon. Member has himself threatened to get up a bloody war in Ireland. Will the right hon. Gentleman search his house and see what arms he has there?

Mr. Finucane and the Protection of Planters.

Captain CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Finucane, Estates Commissioner, gave evidence on 9th November before the Congested Districts Board Commission to the effect that, if residents in those districts to which it was suggested that planters should be transferred resented such migration, he would be prepared to place the planters so transferred under police protection, and that there were morally greater grounds for doing so than in the case of a boycotted landlord; and, if so, will he say whether these statements were made with the sanction of the Government.

Mr. BIRRELL: I have now seen Mr. Finucane's evidence to which the Question refers. Mr. Finucane appears to have expressed the opinion that migrants for whom the Estates Commissioners might provide farms on untenanted land purchased for the purpose should receive police protection in the event of local opposition. Of course the evidence of Mr. Finucane, and of all other witnesses before the Commission, was given of their own motion and without consultation with the Government.

Elphin Disturbances.

Captain CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many, if any, extra police have been required to maintain order in the districts of Shankhill, Caldramore, and The Palace, near Elphin, county Roscommon, within the last four weeks; whether he has any official information showing that the recent disturbances in that part of the country are the outcome of the propaganda of the United Irish League; and whether, on the 1st instant, the resident magistrate had to be sent for to read the Riot Act, but was not available owing to his being in another part of that district, about two miles away, where a disturbance was raging.

Mr. BIRRELL: The force at Elphin Police Station has been strengthened by the addition of six men from adjacent stations. A force of extra police has been brought into Elphin for the preservation of the peace on three occasions, namely, on 31st March, seventy men; on 6th instant, eighteen men; and on 14th instant, seventy men. I am informed that certain local branches of the United Irish League have organised demonstrations with the object of manifesting their opposition to the grazing system. It is not the fact that on the 1st instant or on any other day the resident magistrate was required to read the Riot Act.

*Viscount TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): Can the right hon. Gentleman state if there is any connection between the Camberwell and Elphin branches of the League?

Mr. BIRRELL: I imagine not, Sir.

Captain CRAIG: Upon whom will fall the cost of this large force of police?

Mr. BIRRELL: The case will follow the ordinary rule.

Leitrim Police Barracks.

Mr. DOLAN (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state why it is necessary to maintain police barracks at Garrison, county Fermanagh, Gublaun, county Leitrim, and Kiltyclogher, county Leitrim, as these places are only a mile and a-half apart.

Mr. BIRRELL: The police station at Garrison is two and a-half miles from Gublaun, and six miles from Kiltyclogher, and the two last named stations are five miles apart. Though the Garrison station is comparatively near to Gublaun, the district policed from it extends nine miles to the north and embraces an area of thirty-one square miles. The police authorities are of opinion that each of these stations is necessary, and cannot at present be discontinued.

Irish National Education Administration.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the date upon which the Commissioners of National Education adopted the new rule relating to the appointment of assistant teachers of the same faith as a substantial minority of the children in schools under Protestant management, and give the names of the Commissioners present at the meeting and assenting to this rule.

I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland upon what principle have the Commissioners of National Education decided to differentiate between schools under Protestant management and schools under Roman Catholic management, in requiring that where a substantial minority of the children belong to one religious denomination an assistant teacher of the denomination of that minority should be appointed.

I beg further to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the total number of Protestant children attending primary schools in Ireland under Roman Catholic teachers at the 31st December, 1906, and explain why these children are not permitted to have assistant teachers of their own faith, seeing that Protestant school managers are required to provide assistant teachers of the faith of a substantial minority of the children attending their schools.

May I likewise ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the province of Ulster there are 4,486 Protestant pupils in primary schools under Roman Catholic teachers, and 4,900 Roman Catholic children in primary schools under Protestant teachers; and whether he can explain why Protestant managers are to be required to provide a Roman Catholic teacher for a substantial minority of Roman Catholic children in a Protestant school, whilst Roman Catholic managers are not required to provide a Protestant teacher for the Protestant children attending school under their control.

MR. BIRRELL: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that they do not consider it desirable to give the information asked for in the first of these four Questions. The rule was promoted by the Protestant Commissioners, and was passed unanimously after being on the Agenda Paper for nearly two months. The object of the Commissioners was to remove obstacles to the combined education of Protestants of different denominations. The rule is not to be applied in schools under Protestant management in which there is a minority of Roman Catholic pupils. The total number of Protestant children in national schools under Roman Catholic teachers on 31st December, 1905, was 8,559 or 5·3 per cent. The figures for 1906 are not yet available. The figures quoted in the last Question are for the year ending 31st December, 1905.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): May I ask whether the rule referred to in this Question does not apply to the minority of Protestant children in Irish schools, and whether it is entirely made by Protestant Commissioners?

MR. BIRRELL: I understand that to be so.

MR. LONSDALE: Can the right hon. Gentleman favour us with the name of the Protestant Commissioners?

MR. BIRRELL: I have to be very delicate in handling questions connected with this matter, the Commissioners having informed me that they do not consider it desirable to supply this information.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.): Is it not a matter of principle that, whatever the number, the minority of Protestants are quite as much entitled to protection of Protestant teachers as the Catholics are to Catholic teachers.

MR. BIRRELL: I am not a Member of the National Board and I cannot control the decisions at which they arrive. I understand that what they have done in this matter is in obedience to the general desire of the Protestants in Ireland that there should be a combination of forces in educational matters.

MR. T. L. CORBETT: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire further, and if he does so I think he will be able to see that no such Protestant decision was come to?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

MR. LONSDALE: Is any desire being expressed by the Protestant community in Ireland to have this distinction made?

MR. BIRRELL: I think it must be so.

MR. T. L. CORBETT: Absolutely none. Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiry?

MR. BIRRELL: I will make such inquiries as I can.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): Would not all this be ended if we conceded the right to Irishmen to govern themselves?

MR. SLOAN: May I ask whether in communicating with the National Commissioners the right hon. Gentleman will recommend them to give the same protection to the minority of Protestants as they do to the Catholics?

MR. BIRRELL: I will put that before them, but I have no power to see that it is done.

Baron de Robeck's County Dublin Estate.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants on the county Dublin estate of Baron de Robeck, of Naas, executed agreements for the purchase of their holdings so far back as the 18th April, 1905, and that the sale has not yet been completed, with the result that the tenants are still paying interest at 4 per cent. on the purchase money; and, if so, what is the cause of the delay.

MR. BIRRELL: The purchase agreements in this case were lodged with the Estates Commissioners in June, 1905. The case has not yet reached its turn to be dealt with. It will be dealt with in order of priority, under the Regulations.

North Dublin Council—Labourers' Cottage Advances.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Local Government Board have intimated to the North Dublin Rural District Council that the Treasury will not sanction the advance, under the new Labourers Act, of a greater sum than £180 or £185 to cover the entire cost of cottage and plot; if so, will he say on what authority the Treasury have put a limit on the amount of advances under the Labourers Act; and, in view of the fact that land in the neighbourhood of large centres of population costs much more than elsewhere, and that the cost of building is higher in such places than in the rural districts, if the Treasury intends to adhere to its decision in this matter, if it has given such a decision.

MR. BIRRELL: The Local Government Board have not conveyed to the Rural District Council any such intimation as mentioned in the Question. My predecessor stated in this House that he hoped that the four and a quarter millions named in the new Act would provide at least 25,000 cottages. To do this the average cost throughout Ireland should not exceed £170 on all heads. While it is expected that in certain districts cottages can be provided for less than that sum, the Local Government Board have no doubt that in other districts—those in the vicinity of Dublin for instance—the cost may be somewhat higher. In determining the amount per house which may be allowed in such districts the Board will take into consideration the average cost per cottage under the several schemes already carried out in the district. The object of the Board is to secure the erection of the greatest number of cottages possible with the money available, and in their efforts to attain this object they hope to be supported by local authorities and by Irish opinion generally.

Mayo Inspector of National Schools.

MR. GWYNN (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland why an inspector of national schools, Mr. McMillan, who is hostile to the teaching of Irish, should be kept on duty in the Irish-speaking county of Mayo; and whether he will make representations to occasion this gentleman's removal to another part of Ireland, and to secure that some restraint is put upon the bias referred to.

MR. BIRRELL: The Commissioners of National Education inform me that their inspectors are transferred periodically from one circuit to another. The question of the transfer of Mr. McMillan is at present under the Commissioners' consideration.

Strokestown Union Labourers' Cottages.

MR. JAMES O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Inspector to the Local Government Board, in selecting a site for a labourer's cottage in Kilbarry, Rooskey, Dromod, Strokestown Union, county Roscommon, passed over several comparatively large farms, and selected for the purpose a site upon a farm of 12 acres, 2 roods, 5 poles (valuation £5 18s.), made up for the most part of reclaimed land belonging to a tenant named James Beirne; and whether he will ask the Local Government Board to instruct their Inspector that in taking this action he is not carrying out the object of the Labourers Act.

MR. BIRRELL: The selection of sites for labourers' cottages is made by the Sites Committee of the Rural District Council in conjunction with the engineer employed by the Council, and not by an Inspector or other officer of the Local Government Board. An inquiry will be held by an Inspector as to the propriety of confirming the scheme made by the Rural District Council, and any person interested in a site proposed to be acquired by the Council may attend the inquiry and put forward any objections which he may have to make.

O'Rourke Estate—Turbary Petition.

MR. THOMAS F. SMYTH (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the Irish Land Commission has received a petition from a number of tenants residing at Clooncoose, Newtowngore, county Leitrim, with reference to a portion of turbary on the O'Rourke estate which was to be given to them, and which is now included in the holding of another tenant; and if any action will be taken regarding the same.

MR. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners are unable to trace the receipt of the petition referred to, or to identify any proceedings for the sale of the O'Rourke estate, county Leitrim, as having been instituted before them.

Glen Boat Cove Slip.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the toe end of the boat cove slip, Glen, county Kerry, will shortly be completed by the Congested Districts Board, in view of the fact that, in its unfinished state, it is a source of danger to those engaged in the fishing industry.

MR. BIRRELL: The Congested Districts Board are advised by their engineer that the work in question can only be done in very fine weather. It is hoped to commence the work in the middle of next month, if the weather should permit.

Irish Board of Agriculture—Veterinary Staff.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if a post to be called the Travelling Veterinary Surgeon for Ireland is about to be created by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction; whether in view of the fact that the efficiency of the Department, its organisation and work, are at present the subject of inquiry by a Committee, he will consider the advisability of delaying the creation of this post until the Committee have reported, and the measure for the better government of Ireland is introduced; and whether he will also consider the advisability, in case such a post is created, of providing that no competent man will be denied the opportunity of competing for it.

MR. BIRRELL: I understand that no new post of the description mentioned is to be created. The ordinary transit inspection staff of the Department of Agriculture is to be increased from four to five inspectors, in order to provide for the more effective discharge of the work to be done. It is proposed to fill this post by promotion from the veterinary staff already in the service of the Department. It does not appear to be necessary to await the Report of the Committee before making the appointment.

Irish Officials—Professional Qualifications.

MR. T. L. CORBETT: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what professional qualifications were respectively possessed by the following heads of offices in the High Court in Ireland at the time of their appointments to their present positions, viz, the Registrar to the Court of Appeal, the Accountant General, the present chief clerk to the Lord Chancellor, the chief clerk to the Master of the Rolls, the chief clerk to Mr. Justice Barton, and the Registrar of the Land Judge's Court; whether he is aware that none of the following heads of offices in the High Court in Ireland ever practised either as a barrister or solicitor, but were promoted from subordinate positions on the staff, viz., the Registrar of the Court of Appeal, the Accountant General, the three chief clerks in Chancery, and the Registrar of the Land Judge's Court; and will he state the reasons why men entering the Supreme Court (Ireland) service by open competition are considered ineligible for promotion to be heads of offices, while those who, prior to the passing of The Judicature Act, 1877, entered through patronage and without professional qualifications have frequently been promoted to these posts.

I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can give a list of the posts on the Chancery side of the High Court in Ireland above the rank of first-class clerk for which statute requires that the occupants thereof shall have professional qualifications, and also a list of those for which statute does not require such qualifications.

MR. BIRRELL: These two Questions concern matters which are not under the control of the Irish Government; but in courtesy to the hon. Member I have referred the Questions to the Lord Chancellor, and have received answers from him which, with the hon. Member's permission, I will have circulated with to-night's Votes.† The Answers are of considerable length.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of limiting the power of patronage in Irish public departments, and throwing more posts open to public competition?

MR. BIRRELL: That is under consideration.

Doohooma National School Teacher.

MR. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the cause assigned in the last quarterly return to Mr. Cryan's absence as principal teacher in Doohooma national school, county Mayo, on the 25th and 26th of February last; whether he has satisfied himself that Cryan was assaulted on the 25th February and the key of the school taken from him; and whether, seeing that this teacher's character is marked on the return sheet as satisfactory, he can say what action, if any, he proposes to take in the matter.

MR. BIRRELL: The Commissioners on National Education inform me that managers' returns are regarded as confidential, and they are, therefore, not prepared to answer the first part of the Question. In accordance with my promise to the hon. Member, I have endeavoured to ascertain whether any assault was committed on the teacher, and am informed that the police did not witness any assault, and that no complaint of an assault was made to them by the teacher. I have already informed the hon. Member that if the teacher complains of an assault or breach of contract, the usual legal remedies are open to him.

MR. SLOAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what were the circumstances which caused this school to be closed on two days?

MR. BIRRELL: That I cannot say.

Dromina Evicted Tenant.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the case of Mrs. Ellin O'Shaughnessy, of Kilabraher, Dromina, near Charleville, negotiations were opened by the Estates Commissioners more than twelve months ago, with a view to her reinstatement on the farm from which her late husband had been evicted, and that the landlord, Captain Orpen, and the present occupier of the farm, Timothy Griffin, were both consenting to her reinstatement on condition of Griffin being provided with a farm in lieu of the one he occupies; whether the Estates Commissioners through their inspector, Mr. P. V. Guiry, have repeatedly promised to get a farm for Griffin, but have not yet done so; and whether he will state what further steps, if any, the Estates Commissioners intend to take in the matter.

† See col. 945.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they are at present endeavouring to procure another farm for Timothy Griffin, in order to provide for the reinstatement of the evicted tenant's representative in the farm which Griffin now occupies.

Muniglugh Evicted Tenants.

Mr. SHEEHAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it was agreed upon as one of the essential conditions of the sale of the estate of M. J. Barry, in lunacy, that the evicted tenants should be immediately reinstated; did the agents, Messrs. Nussy & Townsend, give their consent to this proposal; have applications for reinstatements been received by the Estates Commissioners from Timothy Shea, Rahalisk, and Timothy Cronin, Muniglugh; and, seeing that there is no objection whatever on the part of the owners to the reinstatement of these men, will he explain why no steps have been taken to bring about this result; and will he further state when their reinstatement may be expected.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners have received applications for reinstatement from the persons named, and have had the matter inquired into by their Inspector, but have not yet ruled on his report. Both of the tenants were evicted in 1906.

Belfast Police—Medical Staff.

Mr. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the staff of medical attendants in Belfast was reduced from five to four, while the strength of the Belfast Constabulary has substantially increased; will he state how many of the four medical attendants reside within their districts; whether he is aware that in Cork City the police medical attendant for the northern portion of the city lives on the south side, and the medical attendant for the south side lives on the north side; will he say if the surgeon to the force exercises any supervision over the medical attendants to the Royal Irish Constabulary all over Ireland; and, seeing that the police themselves pay these attendants a gross sum of about £10,000 a year out of their salaries, whether he will arrange that they should have some voice in their selection.

Mr. BIRRELL: In 1904 the number of medical attendants upon the police in Belfast was reduced from five to four, upon a redistribution of stations in the city. Formerly there were but two medical attendants in Belfast. Three out of the four reside within their districts. In the remaining case this is not possible. The fact as to the places of residence of the medical attendants for Cork is as stated in the Question. The surgeon to the force, who is attached to the depot, does not exercise supervision over the medical attendants throughout the country. The cost of medical attendance on the constabulary is not provided by the men, but is borne on the Votes. In the circumstances there do not appear to be any grounds for giving the men a voice in the selection of the medical attendants.

Mr. SLOAN: Is it a fact that at least £10,000 are paid out of wages by these men in addition to what is given in the Vote?

Mr. BIRRELL: That may be so.

Mr. SLOAN: If it is so, and if £10,000 are paid, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the possibility of giving the men some voice in the appointment of doctors?

Mr. BIRRELL: I will look into it.

Irish Police Depot Allowances.

Mr. SLOAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether five reserve policemen, including a sergeant, stationed at the depot, in addition to their ordinary emoluments, draw allowances almost equivalent to those paid to seventeen sergeants in charge of stations; will he state what duties these policemen perform in return for such reward; whether the allowances referred to are stopped out of the recruits' pay; and, having regard to the salary paid to these officials, will he explain the cause of the allowances referred to.

Mr. BIRRELL: One sergeant receives an allowance of £3 a month, and five constables receive £1 each a month, for managing the catering arrangements for over 300 recruits at the constabulary depot. A sergeant in charge of a country station receives extra remuneration of 8s. 8d. a month. The catering allowances at the depot are paid out of the general mess expenses, to which recruits have to contribute. The duties are heavy and the hours long, and the Inspector-General considers the remuneration to be well earned.

County Magistracy.

Mr. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he is aware of the disparity between the numbers of Conservative and Liberal magistrates, and of the fact that in at least one county division there is not one single Liberal magistrate, except ex-officio magistrates; and if he will take steps to provide the Lord Chancellor with sufficient assistance to enable him to put an end to the existence of a Bench selected almost entirely from one Party without further delay.

The PRIME MINISTER and FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Stirling Burghs): I cannot possibly know whether or not the fact is as suggested in regard to one division of a county which is not named, but the condition of things is well known. It is impossible to correct it all at once. The Lord Chancellor has, as I have already said on previous occasions, a duty in law which he cannot depute to others. He has no need of any assistance.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON (Yorks, E.R., Holderness): May I ask whether for the future the Government intend to consider a seat on the Bench a reward for political virtue?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No; I think a seat on the Bench ought to be a reward for local public service, but not for either social rank, property connection, or any other consideration of that kind.

Mr. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): Do the Government think that in making selections for the exceedingly important post of Justice of the Peace the accident of a man's political opinions ought to be in any conceivable way considered?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I entirely agree with the hon. Member, and I wish that had been the rule throughout. If that had been the rule in times past, we should not see the extraordinary condition of the Bench generally which we now see. We are engaged in redressing the inequality of the present condition of things. Owing to the extraordinary fullness of the Benches in almost every part of the country, that is a thing which can only be done gradually.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) Does the right hon. Gentleman mean by redressing the inequality, recommending people for appointment to the position of Justice of the Peace because of their political opinions?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have already said that I disclaim any intention of that sort or of keeping that in view; but what I assert is that men who have shown their capacity for acting as magistrates and done good public service in the locality, and are likely to have the confidence of their neighbours—these are the men we ought to recommend.

Mr. BRIDGEMAN: I should like to ask on what the right hon. Gentleman bases his accusation that appointments to the magistracy—

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is going a very long way from the Question on the Paper.

MR. LUPTON: Is it not a fact that the present Lord Chancellor has appointed 700 Conservatives to the County Bench?

*MR. SPEAKER: That really does not arise out of the Question.

Imperial Defence—Mediterranean Stations.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether the Military authorities at Malta were asked to give evidence before the Committee appointed by the Secretary of State for War, in conjunction with the Admiralty, which visited the Mediterranean stations in 1906.

SIR. H CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am informed that the views of the Military authorities at Malta were embodied in a Memorandum of the 29th October by a local Committee presided over by the General Officer Commanding in Chief. This Memorandum was fully considered in connection with the Report of General Owen's Committee. It is evident that the general policy in regard to fixed defences throughout the Empire can only be determined by His Majesty's Government.

In reply to a further question by Mr. Ashley,

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said: The Committee reported to the Government, who have their Memorandum before them.

STANDING ORDERS.

IRISH TOBACCO BILL.

Reported, with Amendments, from the Standing Committee on Trade, etc.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 114.]

Minutes of the Proceedings of the Standing Committee to be printed. [No. 114.]

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be taken into consideration upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 159.]

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES.)

Sir BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Members from the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing,) Shipping, and Manufactures: Sir Edward Strachey and Mr. Lloyd George; and had appointed in substitution; Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Herbert Samuel.

Sir BRAMPTON GURDON further reported from the Committee; That they had added to the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures, the following Fifteen Members in respect of the Coal Mines (Eight Hours) Bill; Mr. Glover, Mr. Enoch Edwards, Mr. William Abraham (Rhondda), Mr. William Johnson, Mr. John Taylor, Mr. John Wilson (Durham), Mr. Cochrane, Viscount Castlereagh, Mr. Lambton, Mr. John Hope, Mr. William Edwin Harvey, Mr. Billson, Mr. Yoxall, Mr. Raphael, and Mr. Cory.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

SHOP CLUBS ACT (1902) AMENDMENT BILL.

"To extend the provisions of Section 1 of the Shop Clubs Act, 1902, to membership of the trades unions and industrial and provident societies," presented by Mr. John Ward; supported by Mr. Enoch Edwards, Mr. Brace, Mr. Maddison, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Fenwick, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Steadman; to be read a second time upon Wednesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 160.]

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.

*THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir JOHN WALTON, Leeds, S.): I have to ask the leave of the House to introduce a Bill for the constitution of a Court of Criminal Appeal, and for extending the powers of our tribunals to review convictions on indictment for criminal offences. It is proposed to end a controversy which at recurrent intervals for sixty years has engaged the attention of Parliament. The settlement which I invite the House to adopt will create appellate rights against convictions for crime, similar to those which exist in relation to adverse verdicts in civil causes. Liberty will thus be put upon an equality with property, and the consequences of judicial miscarriage will receive in each case similar protection. The administration of our criminal law has attained its present unsurpassed reputation in spite of defects of procedure which are irreconcilable with the acknowledged principles of all sound jurisprudence. Various mitigating causes have tended to obviate the defective operation of an imperfect system. The generous bias of our courts towards the innocent until they have been shown to be guilty; the conscientious solicitude and high character of our Judges, and the tempering jurisdiction of the Home Office have done much to accomplish this result. But justice has blundered. Innocent men have been convicted, and the number of the victims of judicial miscarriage during the last few years has not been inconsiderable. This question, owing to recent incidents and developments, has been forced to the front. The Royal Commission recently reported that the resources of the Home Office were neither adequate nor satisfactory. The admissibility of the evidence of an accused person in his own behalf, tainted as it often is by falsehood in regard to collateral matters, tending to prejudice a good case and to confuse the issues to be tried, makes the conduct of criminal trials more difficult. Public sympathy in recent striking instances has been aroused by the misfortunes of men who have been called upon to suffer that most terrible form of moral torture which confounds the innocent with the guilty, and condemns them to a common fate. An enterprising Press has rushed in where jurists have feared to tread, and retrial by newspaper threatens to take the place which ought to be occupied by the process of rehearing before a judicial tribunal. Last, but not least, the delicate and difficult duties of the Home Secretary have been discharged under the pressure of public agitation, which has made calm and independent judgment well-nigh impossible. These considerations have led the Government to the conclusion that the time for some change has arrived. Last year a Bill was introduced by the Lord Chancellor and passed through the House of Lords, which will, I trust, ever associate his name honourably with this great change in our jurisprudence. The present measure differs in material respects from that which then passed through the other House. In its present form, I trust it will not meet with those hostile Motions which threatened the introduction of its predecessor. I have given careful consideration to the criticisms, many of them most able and cogent, which have reached me from many quarters, and I trust that I shall be able to count former opponents of the measure among its present friends. The Court will be constituted of seven Judges of the King's Bench Division, selected and presided over by the Lord Chief Justice of England. They will be invited to undertake the duties arising under this legislation, in addition to the functions which they now discharge. The right to appeal in matters of law will be unqualified; in matters of fact it will take place with the leave of the Court of Appeal. This proposal revives an ancient procedure, and it is attended by this great advantage, that the Court will be able to prevent the abuse of its process by the raising of unfounded and frivolous contentions. There will be no new trial. The scandals to justice, which must very often occur on the retrial of a criminal cause, will not happen in consequence of the provisions of this measure, and the accused person will be spared an ordeal which is consequent upon no misconduct on his part. The Court will have ample powers to get at the truth. They will be able, if necessary, to summon fresh evidence. When they have satisfied themselves, so far as they can, of the true merits of the case before them, it will be their duty to determine whether the conviction should stand, should be set aside, or should be modified, and whether the sentence which is challenged should remain as it was pronounced, or should be brought into harmony with principles of general application, by which the duration of the punishment is made to correspond with the gravity of the crime. This is not a rich man's Bill. It was said that the last measure possessed that character. It will not be said of this Bill. An official is appointed whose duty it will be to obtain the materials which it is necessary to place before the Court for the consideration of the petition of every appellant; and if professional assistance be required a solicitor and counsel will be appointed to argue his case. This Bill differs from the last in one respect which will be appreciated by my legal friends who are Members of this House. The machinery will not be left to be framed by ex post facto regulations. It is substantially embodied in the Bill itself, and the whole history of the litigation may be reviewed from beginning to end. A Rule Committee will be appointed, which will have power either to complete or to modify or amplify the procedure prescribed as experience may dictate. The Court of Crown Cases Reserved will have its jurisdiction transferred to this tribunal, but the economic and excellent machinery in connection with that tribunal will remain untouched. The prerogative of the Crown will be unaffected, but the Secretary of State will have the inestimable advantage of being able to take the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal upon any question on which his advice to the Sovereign may depend. This is the measure which I would like the House to consider. It is a non-Party Bill. I am sanguine enough to believe it will be non-contentious also. Notwithstanding, in my humble opinion, it yields to none in the order of its importance. It affects immediately and possibly for all time the administration of justice in that sphere of its operations in which it touches the defence of personal security, which is the absolute condition of individual happiness and welfare on the part of every member of the community throughout all classes of our population. I beg to move.

Motion made, and Question, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish a Court of Criminal Appeal, and to amend the Law relating to Appeals in Criminal Cases"—put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney-General and Mr. Secretary Gladstone.

CRIMINAL APPEAL BILL.

"To establish a Court of Criminal Appeal, and to amend the Law relating to Appeals in Criminal Cases," presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 161.].

PATENTS AND DESIGNS BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood) said that early that morning, about 12.15, the Patronage Secretary put down certain Bills for discussion for "to-morrow." Amongst those Bills was the Patents Bill, which appeared in the Orders of the Day. What he desired to ask was whether when those Bills were put down by order of the House for one day it was competent for the Government after the House had adjourned to secure their advance by one day.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must take the responsibility for having made the alteration. The truth is that it escaped the Patronage Secretary and myself that it was past midnight, and consequently "to-morrow" became "today." I think the House generally understood that we should take this Bill on Wednesday.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR F. CAWLEY (Lancashire, Prestwich), in supporting the Second Reading, said the first patent, as far as he could discover, was granted in 1626 and recited that—

> "Because much time and labour and money has been spent by Walter Drummond, and because the invention may be of use and advantage to the State the King grants a monopoly, but should the said Walter Drummond fail to reduce to practice within three years his scheme of patent, the said patent shall then lapse."

From that it was perfectly clear that the patent had not been granted to the inventor for his ingenuity alone, but also for his services to the State in introducing a new manufacture to the realm. It appeared to him that those conditions were just, and ought to govern our present practice, and that no patent should be granted without a patentee's being required to work his invention in this country. If, however, all countries did as we did, that was, grant a patent to anybody and everybody who applied, there would be nothing to object to; but when all other countries took a different view, he thought there was not much to be said for our present practice. In Germany, if a patent was not worked within three years, it could be revoked and declared void. In France, if a patent was not worked within two years it could be revoked. In fact, in practically every industrial country, including Japan, patentees had to work their patents, or to get them worked within a certain time of their being granted, or their grant might be revoked. We were the only country in Europe that allowed a patentee to take his grant away and work it where he liked, or sell it to whom he liked. The result of this careless liberality was that foreigners came here and got patents granted them without ever having the slightest intention of working them in this country. They not only did this, but, aided by powerful associations and syndicates, particularly in Germany, they used these patents to filch our trade away, and in this, he was sorry to have to say, they had often been successful. In 1903 we had granted nearly 8,000 patents or monopolies to persons residing outside this country, in fact, more than half the patents taken out here, and the most important ones had been taken out by foreigners. We granted a larger number of patents (about 5,000 more) than Germany did every year, although the population of Germany was one-third greater than our own. Some of these patents were only taken out for blocking purposes, and were unscrupulously used when our manufacturers wished to make any article which would compete with a German production. Others which were of importance were taken abroad and were used to start industries there by new and improved processes, and so superseded industries carried on in this country. Thus our manufacturers suffered great injury and our workpeople lost their employment. Although a patent lasted only fourteen years it was long enough to establish the industry abroad, and once established there, with trained labour, experience, and an organised system of distribution, it was no easy matter to get it back again. What they said was that the granting of a patent, which was really a monopoly, was in the nature of protection, and that for every monopoly granted there should be a quid pro quo to the State granting it. We got no quid pro quo for the monopolies we gave, but we allowed the person to whom the monopoly was granted to produce his patented articles solely abroad; in other words we ran contrary to the doctrine of free trade, not for our own benefit, but for the benefit of the foreigner. Most patents that were granted to Englishmen were probably worked in this country, but they had to remember that we had no monopoly of genius in this country, and that as the population of America and other European countries was 440,000,000 and that of the United Kingdom was only 40,000,000, we could not expect to produce the same number of inventions as they did; and when we considered also that they were advancing in their manufacturing capacity by leaps and bounds, it followed that the number of patents granted to foreigners would greatly increase, and that if the present state of affairs was allowed to continue we should not only lose our share of the new industries which were so rapidly springing up, but we stood a very great chance of losing the supremacy we still held in old ones. The great industrial progress of Germany had recently figured very largely in discussions on our fiscal system. That Germany had made enormous strides could not be denied, and in his opinion the advantages that she had enjoyed through our absurd leniency in regard to patents had been one great factor in the success which she had attained, in some degree at our expense. The chemical industry of Germany had increased rapidly, and now amounted, with allied industries, to something like 70,000,000 per annum, and part of that trade had been taken away from this country. Was it not quite time there should be some close investigation to see the cause? When it was considered that the process of manufacturing aniline colours from coal tar was discovered in this country, that the industry was commenced and flourished in this country, that we were the greatest producers of the raw material from which the colours were made, that we had cheap fuel and a favourable geographical position, and that we were also the greatest consumers of the finished article, and that we had allowed this enormous trade to be taken way from us, it was, he thought, humiliating. There were in Germany engaged in this manufacture five firms, who employed something like 26,000 hands, and had an aggregate capital whose market value was something like £16,000,000 sterling. Most of the labour employed in these works was unskilled labour, and was the very kind of work which would absorb our unemployed if we only insisted that there should be a quid pro quo for the monopolies we granted and that they should not be taken away and used to find work for foreign labour in foreign countries at the expense of our fellow-countrymen. It was a well-known fact that the foundation of the aniline colour industry in Germany had been laid by the manufacture of alizarine, for which a number of patents for working it commercially had been obtained in this country, with the result that everyone was able to make and sell in that country, whilst in this country it was a close monopoly, and our dyers were charged an enormous price for an article which could be just as well made by us as by Germans. The patent for this article had now lapsed, but the business had been so firmly established in Germany both by the scientific process of manufacturing and by the organisations for distribution, that we had not been able to wrest the trade from them. But he would like to call the special attention of the House to the question of artificial indigo. We employed something like 200,000 people in India on the indigo plantations. The Germans had discovered an artificial indigo which, on account of its much lower price, was superseding the vegetable product. The capital employed would, he supposed, be lost, and German labour and German capital employed in its stead. In this case it would be seen that we were losing an industry, which had found employment for thousands of our Indian fellow-subjects, through granting the Germans a British patent or monopoly without imposing upon them any obligation to work it in this country. Had we said to them as they said to us: "If we grant you a patent or monopoly for the sale of this article, you must, in return, manufacture the article here," we would by now have had large works in this country giving employment to numbers of labourers. By our patent laws, as they were at present, we were benevolently fostering great industries in Germany, to the detriment of the manufacturers, consumers, and working-classes of this country. The supporters of this measure wanted no interference with free trade. All they asked was just and equitable treatment. They held that monopolies should not be granted to foreigners to be used to handicap us in that competition which was every day becoming more acute. Hon. Members opposite seemed to think that this was a question of protection. It was not a question of protection. We had been granting thousands of patents to foreigners and getting nothing in exchange. What was now proposed to be done was to say to the inventor: "We are going to grant you a monopoly of the strictest kind possible, but if we do that, the country at least ought to have some recompense for having done it." The patent ought not merely to be a prize to the inventor who applied for it. The country where the man was granted protection ought at least to have some share in the benefit. If a man obtained a patent in this country he ought to manufacture the goods here. He thought this Bill would go some distance towards stopping foreigners from obtaining an advantage in our markets and giving nothing in exchange.

*Mr. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston) said that when the Second Reading of the Bill was moved many hon. Members waited to see whether the senior Member for Merthyr Tydvil would move the Amendment of which he had given notice. Clause 10 of the Bill, against which the Amendment was obviously directed, appeared to most Members of the House to do nothing but justice to British inventors. But hon. Members opposite seemed to think that there might be found in it some trace of that fiscal reform or fair trade, of which they were so much afraid. However, it seemed that the hon. Member who had given notice of the Amendment was not bold enough to move it, and he therefore proposed to put before the House some general criticisms of the measure. Under the new Rules just passed the Bill would probably be sent to a Standing Committee, so that he and many others might have no chance of criticising the details. They must, therefore, call attention to the defects of the Bill on the Second Reading. He recognised that the intention of the Bill was to improve the patent laws, and also that there were many clauses which would be of real use to inventors in this country. He did not intend to vote against the Second Reading. But he was a little bit afraid that,in attempting to improve the patent laws and the position of the inventor, the Bill might make that position worse in some respects than it was now. There were clauses in the Bill which would cast on the inventor, and especially the inventor of moderate means, a heavy burden which he would not be very well able to bear. The effect of these clauses would be to discourage the taking out of patents, and thus many small inventors would be deprived of the benefits of their ingenuity. He instanced Clause 2 with respect to the "deposit of samples in the case of chemical inventions," as a serious matter. There were inventions in chemistry which related to intermediate processes and which could not be exemplified by samples; and there were other inventions of which samples could not be provided without considerable expense. Unless great care was taken that cause would be found impossible to work. Having taken the opinion of others on the question, he did not think that particular provision was necessary, and he was inclined to say that on the whole it would be better not to have it in the Bill. A matter of more importance was Clause 6 "Grounds of opposition." It provided that the grant of a patent might be opposed on the ground—

> "That the invention has been described or claimed in any complete specification for a British patent which is or will be of prior date to the patent the grant of which is opposed, or that the invention has been published in this country prior to the date which the patent would bear if granted, or on the ground that the nature of the invention or the manner in which it is to be performed is not suffcently or fairly described and ascertained in the complete specification."

If this provision were passed, almost any application for a patent might be opposed, there being thouands of old specifications lumbering up the patent office which might be cited in opposition to new applications. He was afraid that the clause might lead to many useful patents meeting with serious and formidable opposition. That would cause very serious expense which many small investors would not be able to bear. It would be found that an application for a patent, instead of being, as now, a simple and not very expensive matter, would become, in many cases, very expensive indeed, with the result that inventors would be discouraged from taking out patents. The same observation applied to Clause 9 with reference to "Power of comptroller to revoke patents on certain grounds." They knew what the competition in trade was—the competition of large firms against small ones, and of foreign against British firms. These firms would pay almost any sum in order to get rid of a patent which interfered with their operations. There would be a temptation to large firms to use Clause 9 as an engine of oppression against men who could not afford the cost of defending their inventions. If so, Clauses 6 and 9 would throw on inventors a very serious burden indeed. He knew that was not intended, but he thought that would be their effect, and they ought, therefore, to be carefully considered in Committee. Another important point was as to the tribunal which was to have the decision of these matters. Under the Bill, as it stood, questions as to the grant of patents, questions of revocation, and others, which involved a very careful consideration of facts and of law, and very often of scientific questions which could only be determined by a skilled Judge, or arbitrator, were to be decided by the Comptroller. He had not a single word to say against the Comptroller or against the way in which he exercised his functions at the present time, but he was an official with administrative duties. He had charge of a very important department in which he was certainly engaged in work mainly of an administrative character. He was appointed for that purpose, and no doubt he found the work heavy enough. Now it was proposed to throw on that official, who was not a Judge, the duty of deciding the difficult and intricate questions which arose on applications for, and revocations of patents. Only recently there was an application for revocation of a patent which occupied seven or eight days in hearing before a learned Judge. Similar cases would arise under the clauses of this Bill, and was it really intended that cases of that kind should come before the Comptroller, who, though a very competent official, could not properly undertake the work? He did not think that inventors and others interested would be satisfied with that proposal. There was to be an appeal to one Judge, whose decision was to be final. He thought every case of importance would be appealed. There was no branch of the law where appeals were more frequent, or so certain to occur, as in patent cases. If in every important case there would be an appeal, why did not the Government take their courage in both hands and provide at once that those cases should come before a Judge? Half the expense would be saved, a hearing would be had once for all, and a decision would be obtained satisfactory to the litigants. Another point was that it was not very satisfactory to have appeals taken from the Comptroller to a law officer. He did not think it was right to give judicial powers to the law officers of the Crown; only a Judge should exercise them. If a Patent Court, such as he had suggested, were set up, those appeals from the Comptroller's decision which now went to the law officers would also go direct to the Court. Again, let them take the question of actions for infringements of patents. As many Members knew, a person could bring an action for infringement and choose his Court—usually the Chancery Division. But the result was that those patent cases which were foreign to the ordinary work of the Chancery Division came now before one Judge and now before another; and although the cases were disposed of with great ability, still, that was not the best way of securing consistent decisions. These cases also should go to a Patent Court for which there would then be ample work. There were also the interlocutory applications in patent cases, which also ought to go before the Patent Judge. He did not say that the patent Court must necessarily be always presided over by the same Judge, who might in that case get into a groove; but the Judge might be appointed for a year, and another Judge for another year. He hoped that the Government would consider, before the Committee stage, the suggestions he had made, and discover a method by which they could be given effect to. It was true that Clause 17 provided that all appeals from a decision of the Comptroller should be made to such Judge of the High Court as the Lord Chancellor might select for the purpose, and that the decision of that Judge should be final. But that did not meet the matter at all, because that provision was confined to appeals under this Bill and would not apply to the existing patent litigation which was very heavy indeed. The views which he had expressed were, he knew, held by many men of experience in the legal profession and by commerical men who had a real interest in the matter.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said he desired briefly to call the attention of the President of the Board of Trade to an aspect of the Bill which seemed to him been overlooked by the Board. Clause 16 made void conditions or contracts which extended far beyond use of a patented article and would in many cases most seriously hamper the licensee in his trade. He was not sure that Clause 16, as drawn, covered the whole ground, and he thought it should be amplified in Committee. His main point, however, was that Clause 16 was not retrospective. He wanted to point out how very serious would be the position in which those persons would be who were bound by existing contracts and by conditions similar to those which this Bill would make void in the case of future contracts. If the Bill became law those persons would be left in a much worse position than they were now in; that was to say, they would be bound by onerous and oppressive conditions and yet have to compete with men, who coming after the passing of this Bill, would not be hampered in a similar manner. Something ought to be done in the interests of those persons. Possibly a remedy might be found by extending Clause 11 which related to petitions for the revocation of patents. He suggested that upon a petition for the revocation of a patent the Court should take into account the conditions of existing contracts similar to those which this Bill would make void in the case of future contracts. That might be one of the grounds on which a patent might be revoked. Of course he was aware that the mere revocation of a patent would not, of itself, put an end to the existing contract, or relieve the party to the contract from the onerous conditions. But in the case he was supposing it would work out in this way. If Clause 11 were altered in the direction he had indicated the effect would be that, through fear of the patent being revoked, such pressure might be brought to bear on the owner of the patent that he would be willing to come to reasonable terms with the persons bound by these contracts. He hoped that, if not in this way in some other way, means would be found in Committee to meet the cases of many persons in the country, especially in the boot and shoe manufacturing industry, who at the present time were bound by the most onerous and oppressive conditions.

*SIR F. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) said that he approved of some of the suggestions which had been made by the hon. and learned Member for Kingston in regard to Clauses 10 and 17, and as to the constitution of a Patent Court; and he hoped that the latter suggestion would be embodied in the Bill at a later stage or in subsequent legislation. As to the general scope and character of the Bill he was convinced that the President of the Board of Trade had endeavoured in a comprehensive way to cover many of the difficulties that had arisen in regard to Patent Law and to adjust in an equitable manner conflicting interests. They were all anxious to give the greatest possible encouragement to invention. It was part of the life-blood of a free trade country to encourage invention, and there was no taint of protection in giving an inventor a guarantee that he would be protected in the use of his idea and his property rights in it during a reasonable period. The points which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green were of grave importance in framing a law dealing with patents in a free trade country. The manufacturers of a free trade country ought to, and he believed did, welcome every invention to which they could obtain access from abroad which would help to develop their industry, earn them larger profits, and help the community in which they lived. We in this country welcomed ideas and improvements from abroad, but the position of the boot and shoe industry at the present moment was of singular interest and vividly illustrated what might indeed happen in a free trade country in regard to other trades. They were all aware that the old-fashioned methods of hand-sewn work of twenty or thirty years ago had begun to disappear for some years past, and it became a matter of life and death to that industry to avail itself of all new inventions in machinery, and especially those produced in America. In the Eastern States of America, where this was the leading trade, the application of machinery to it had been carried to the highest possible point. It had become almost imperative that the manufacturers should acquire that machinery for use in this country at any cost and risk to themselves. In consequence of this necessity they had placed themselves, it might be said unwisely and without sufficient regard to their own interests or to the interest of the community, under the most onerous conditions to acquire the right to use this machinery. So restrictive and so prejudicial to the great industries of this country, and to the highest interests of trade and commerce generally were these conditions that he contended that there ought to be in a Bill like this some machinery for dealing with conditions which were wholly prejudicial to our trade. What had happened was this. These American manufacturers of machinery required for the purposes of the boot and shoe industry had bound themselves together and had accumulated a large amount of capital. They had brought their capital and their ideas to this country. Nobody grudged them that. He welcomed the access of American capital and manufactures to this country. But whilst we welcomed new ideas and fresh stores of raw material from every part of the world and the influx of capital and the products of industry, and whilst we wished to guarantee the fullest patent rights which the law granted the inventor for the use of his inventions, there was another side to the question. It was one thing to do that, but it was quite another for an American company or syndicate to come over here and patent not only its ideas but all the ideas of the American Protectionist trusts, and to introduce the most tyrannical form of monopoly, restricting the commercial and industrial enterprise and freedom of our manufacturers, and reducing them to the position of having sold all their liberties as industrial men. Our manufacturers would not grudge these men payment for the use of their ideas, or their full reward for that use. That would be wholly inconsistent with the law and traditions upon which the whole edifice of British trade had been founded. But the conditions which had been imposed in this coercive fashion, when it was almost a matter of life and death for the British manufacturer to accept anything which was in the nature of an improvement of the machinery imported, were most oppressive. Our manufacturers entered into agreements which were to last for twenty years, six years beyond the length of the life of a patent in this country, and they agreed to continue to pay the royalty on any improvement or new attachment whether it was patented or not, which might be added to that machinery solely at the will of the manufacturing company. Without the consent and without the leave of the manufacturer, the American syndicate might come and attach to the machinery any alleged improvement and they obtained a fresh lease of their royalty upon the machinery. Under their contract they not only took the right to have the royalty during the period of the patent, but they could prolong the life of their royalty and levy a toll upon the industry for an indefinite number of years. Another group of covenants was also very serious and gave the syndicates and companies far more extended privileges than those which the Patent Laws of this country had ever given to any inventor. The Patent Law debarred no one from any access to a new invention, but these companies not only provided that their machines should be used in a fair way, but the users of them were debarred from using any other machines in connection with the machines which had been leased by the company, and that again was extended by this process of adding improvements and attachments. If the business of a manufacturer was successful and some work came in he had no option. He could not go to a British maker of machinery or to one in Belgium, Germany, or elsewhere, but was bound for ever, or at least during the period of the lease or the prolongation which the syndicates obtained under these covenants, to go on obtaining machinery from and dealing with these companies. That seemed to him a tremendous and improper expansion of any right which it was intended to give to any invention by the Patent Laws of this country. Not only that, but if a firm of manufacturers under good advice had expended a large sum in obtaining machinery from Germany, that had to be stopped and machines used which came under the conditions of the hiring company. Furthermore, if one of these manufacturers had taken a machine from the company which only carried out one of the many operations of the industry he was bound to use no machinery from any other source for any of the other operations, but to obtain every detail of the machinery used from the syndicate, and any other machinery was agreed to be scrapped. Reference had been made to the revoking of patents and there were many processes for declaring them to be invalid, but under these contracts it was provided that a man should continue to pay fees and royalties in cases in which patents relating to the machine which he had hired had been revoked or otherwise declared to be invalid. It seemed to him that this was a monstrous and intolerable state of things which should be dealt with in a decisive manner by legislation. He had seen several leases of machinery containing these provisions, and he was assured that some of the leases actually contained covenants and provisions requiring the lessee to assent to any subsequent condition which the company might impose. He contended that these conditions which had been pressed on a great industry amounted to duress. There ought to be a full and entire remedy for this state of things, and his hon. friend the Member for Bethnal Green had said that Clause 16 ought to be made retrospective. They who were old Members of the House of Commons were well aware how very difficult it would be to get the House of Commons, not to say another place, to assent to a proposal cancelling existing contracts. Of course, such a course presented great difficulty. In Clause 11 of this Bill some attempt, however, seemed to be made to move in that direction. If they had the power to revoke a patent, not only because the owner of it was not using it and affording proper advantages and facilities to the public who might use it, it seemed to him that they ought to have a clear and effective provision in this clause, and he hoped that in the course of the Bill through Committee such additions might be made to Clause 16, which seemed very good, as far as it went, to prevent as regarded future contracts all the injuries to which he had alluded. In regard to syndicates holding such a powerful position, they ought definitely and in terms to bar out such provisions as had been imported into these contracts. It was in the interest of the industry of the whole community that such a state of things should not exist. If the Bill were to pass in its present form there were points which some of his friends and himself thought were not covered by Clause 16, and if some of the other clauses were not amended the position would be intolerable. He appealed to his right hon. friend to exercise all the ingenuity in his power to defeat what seemed to be a protectionist conspiracy to utilise the open door and the generous hearts of a free trade country, and to endeavour to secure equal opportunity for the development of a great industry so far as it depended on the free use of inventions, whether of this country or abroad, to all men who carried on their business in this country.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham) hoped he would not disturb the harmony which had been the feature of the discussion of the Bill that afternoon, by commenting on one or two remarks that had fallen from the hon. Member who opened the discussion. The hon. Member had assured them that many goods were sold more cheaply in Germany than in this country. His only comment on that was that it was a remarkable admission for a free trader and a member of the Free Trade Party to make in the House of Commons. He understood that one of the great planks of the free trade platform was that everything was sold more dearly in a protectionist than in a free trade country. Apparently however the hon. Member did not share the views of the great majority of his Party. The hon. Member went on to say that the House in passing this Bill would be saying in effect to the inventor, "We are giving you protection and we expect the country to obtain some advantage thereby." He quite agreed with the hon. Member, and he only hoped that at some future date the House in passing a fuller measure of protection would say the same thing to the manufacturers of this country. He thought the hon. Gentleman, if it was not impertinent to say so, had spoilt an otherwise excellent speech by the remarks he had made use of at the end in which he said this Bill had nothing whatever to do with fiscal reform, and he could not help thinking of the words used by the present Secretary of State for India in 1900 when he said—

> "In this era of militarism which they promise us, domestic reform, constitutional, fiscal, or any other reform, will be very slow in coming, but real and deep danger is the loss of our industrial supremacy. Great rivals are springing up against us in all the markets of the world."

He did not treat any kind of fiscal reform as one would treat the plague, as the hon. Member who opened this discussion appeared to treat it. Then he thought they on that side of the House had listened with great interest to the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, and although he did not intend to follow him into all his arguments about the state of the boot trade in Northamptonshire, he could not help thinking that that was rather a doleful afternoon for the free importers, because first they had the Member for Prestwich telling them that goods were sold more cheaply in Germany than in this country, and then they had the hon. Member for East Northants giving a doleful picture of the state of the boot trade in Northamptonshire and the way in which our American rivals had got the better of us. He did not wish to turn the debate into a free trade and protectionist discussion; he only desired to make a suggestion with regard to Clause 2 to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. His hon. friend the Member for the Kingston Division of Surrey objected to Clause 2 on the ground that it might inflict hardship on the poor inventor. He was not sure that he agreed with his hon. friend. It appeared to him that there could be no objection to Clause 2 if the right hon. Gentleman gave to the Comptroller full discretion in the matter.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: He has got it already.

*VISCOUNT TURNOUR said he had not seen it. If the Comptroller had discretion, it was discretion of a very limited character. His suggestion was that the Comptroller should be given an unfettered discretion in these matters, because he thought that would get over the difficulty which hon. Members on both sides of the House felt. The only other point he wished to refer to was on Clause 10. It was with diffidence that he made the remark, but it seemed to him that the effect of the clause would be to throw on the Comptroller the onus of defining the meaning of a treaty, with, of course, an appeal to the Judge. He believed that in previous Bills introduced into the House to amend the patent laws the promoters had been very careful to avoid putting that onus upon either the Comptroller or the Judge. In his opinion it made it rather dangerous if it was intended to give this power to the Comptroller or the Judge, but no doubt the right hon. Member had good reason for putting what he had into the Bill. He hoped the Bill would pass through all its stages very quickly and become law, and that it would remove one of the many unfair restrictions from which inventors and manufacturers in this country suffered at the present moment. If it was not impertinent to do so he would like to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on, he would not say the first, but one of the first steps which he had taken in the direction of protection.

MR. MOND (Chester) said the Bill made inroads on the rights of patentees in a manner which, he thought, was scarcely realised. He did not think there was any necessity to reply to the noble Lord opposite. The fact that certain goods might be produced more cheaply in a protectionist country, the general fiscal system of the country not being the only consideration in the case, was too elementary to be discussed. To his mind the Bill was in no way a step in the direction of protection. He wished to draw attention to Clause 9, which, as at present drafted, would lead to the curious result that part of the procedure under it would have to take place before the Comptroller and part before a Judge; that was to say, if it was desired to revoke a patent on some grounds, application would have to be made to the High Court, while, if certain other grounds were taken, the application would have to be made to the Comptroller, so that there would have to be two petitions floating at the same time. It was admitted that inventors were the most poorly-paid people in the country. What was really the grievance of members of the boot trade? They seemed to have entered into some imprudent arrangement, and now came and asked the House for a Bill to cancel that arrangement and to alter the law in a very important particular in order that they might get out of an unprofitable contract. Clause 16 referred to the avoidance of certain conditions attached to the sale of patented articles. A patented article in this Bill was defined as an article made by a patent process. A man made a bleaching powder with a patent, and another made it without a patent. Supposing the latter made a contract with a customer to sell to him for ten years, that contract was not included in the provision. But supposing the man who manufactured by a patented process made a similar contract, it could at any moment be cancelled as being void in law. He submitted with very great diffidence whether that was not the right interpretation of the very complicated language of Clause 16. It was a point to which he seriously drew the attention of his right hon. friend. Under the clause an article made under a process which happened to be patented thereby became a patented article. That might not be the intention of Clause 16, but the clause as it now stood was very dangerous indeed. An industry should not have more hardships placed upon it without very serious deliberation, and they ought not to interfere with the right of contract between business people exercised in a business way. Another important point was as to the compulsory working clauses. A great many people were very enthusiastic about the compulsory working clauses. He had some experience of similar clauses abroad, and he did not flatter himself that they would be any more effective here than they had been elsewhere. Their effect abroad had been absolutely nil. He had taken the trouble to look up both the French and the German compulsory working clauses, which provided that where the inventor did not make efforts for the working of his invention in two years, or did not work it for two consecutive years, he lost the right to his patent. Surely, it ought to be that somebody should be allowed to continue the monopoly and right to the patent, if the patentee did not exercise it in his country, or refused to grant reasonable licences to somebody else. If he exercised the right in some other country that seemed to him to be a point quite apart, and one which seriously conflicted with Section 5 of the Convention of 1883. As far as he could see, the clause as now drafted seriously contravened that Convention; and it appeared to him that the Patent Office, already overworked, in making an order would have to study every Convention to find out whether the order affected any one of the Conventions. He was an English patentee, and he carried on his manufacture in Sweden because of the water power obtained there; consequently he would be robbed of the benefit of his invention as far as England was concerned. The Bill took away the right of the patentee to go to the House of Lords on a question of the revocation of a patent. After all, patents were very valuable property, and why should the patentee, less than any other subject in England who had the right to go to the highest Court of Appeal, be under the control of one Judge, and debarred from taking his appeal to the House of Lords in order to get a decision on a point which might involve millions of money? He could understand its being done with the idea of saving expense, but patents which were worth anything were, as a rule, worth spending money upon. He thought that the powers of the Comptroller would really have to be altered, and if his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade could see his way to constitute, once and for all, a competent Court to deal with patent cases, he would confer one of the greatest boons on inventors, patentees, and commercial men, and he was sure it would save an enormous amount of money. At that stage of the Bill he would not go into further technical points. He thought the Bill could very well be referred to a Committee; but he hoped that the points he had raised would be very carefully considered, and that they would have, when the Bill was passed, something which would approach finality. They all knew that people connected with patents found it very difficult to understand the patent laws of the country, which were very expensive and discouraging. He hoped that some of the suggestions thrown out by the hon. and learned Member opposite would be carried out, and that on the Committee stage of the Bill the Government would carefully consider, as he had no doubt they would, the Amendments which would be placed before them by experts who had devoted the best part of their lives to the subject.

*Mr. J. D. WHITE (Dumbartonshire) said that anyone familiar with the working of the patent system had recognised the necessity of legislation along the lines of this Bill. In any legislation dealing with the relation of home and foreign patents it was necessary to bear in mind that we could not differentiate as against foreigners, because, by the International Convention of 1883, the subjects of States which were parties to that Convention, were to be treated on the same basis as our own people. With reference to the actual proposals of the Bill, he thought that a great deal was to be said in favour of the requirement, as regards certain chemical patents, that the Board of Trade should have power to require samples to be deposited. This would do a very considerable amount towards lessening the evils which arose from what were commonly called "paper anticipations." There was a difficulty which he was bound to point out, and it was that the Bill proposed that samples might be required to be deposited not merely with a complete specification, but also with a provisional specification. The object of the provisional specification system was to enable the inventor to obtain priority of time and to develop his invention, which he described subsequently at length in his complete specification, and until he had developed his invention he might be seriously hampered if he had to deposit a sample with his provisional specification. The clause relating to restrictive conditions in the use of patented articles was of great importance. It had been all along the case that the patentee had been regarded as having the field entirely to himself, and that if people used his patent he could impose upon them any conditions he liked. The hardship of that was that where restrictive conditions were imposed, and there was a breach of those conditions, it was treated by the Court not as a breach of contract, but as an infringement of the patent, and the whole system of injunction was brought to bear to strengthen the patentee in his position, which was a far stronger and more exclusive one than it was intended by the law to give him. He was glad that this Clause 16, which had been so much discussed, had been put into the Bill. He would suggest one Amendment for the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman. The clause dealt only with the restrictions as regarded the use of an article by persons engaged in a trade or industry. It seemed to him that this was a highly undesirable limitation, and that there should be an end once and for all of these restrictive conditions as regards the use of patented articles, whether they were used in the case of a trade or industry, or in the ordinary course of daily life. He suggested that these words of limitation which limited the effect of the clause to articles used in trade or industry should be struck out. Clause 10 seemed to be one of the most important in the Bill, but he doubted whether he could support it as it stood. It referred to the revocation of patents worked outside the United Kingdom. He did not put his objection to the clause on the ground of free trade or protection, because that question did not really come in, as patents were certainly not questions of free trade or protection but monopolies, which were necessary to protect inventors and experimenters in the result of their labours. Therefore as it was not a matter of free trade or protection he proposed to discuss it on other lines. In the first place, he would like to consider what would be the effect in this country. A large number of foreign inventions were brought over to this country. He instanced the case of typewriting machines from the United States. Those machines were sold here at about the same prices as in the United States. Had they any quarrel with that? If this clause were put into operation it might lead to certain parts of these American typewriting machines being made in this country, but it would increase the cost of production and the price of these articles to the general public. He ventured to think that very grave difficulties would arise under this clause in regard to articles manufactured exclusively or mainly outside the United Kingdom. He did not know what "mainly outside" meant, and probably they would require a long series of legal decisions to find out. The great difficulty which the inventor had to face was obtaining capital to work his invention. He was very much afraid that if this clause became law they would find powerful syndicates attempting to freeze out poor inventors by threatening that unless they sold their patents at breaking-up prices they would take steps for an action for revocation. Those considerations weakened the argument in favour of Clause 10. He thought the object of that clause could be met sufficiently by a satisfactory system of compulsory licences. He wished to congratulate the President of the Board of Trade on the changes he proposed to introduce in regard to compulsory licences in giving those who sought them an easier, cheaper, and more rapid tribunal than the Privy Council. That would in itself almost be enough. There was another thing which would do a great deal in the same direction, and he would commend it to his right hon. friend. As all those familiar with patent law actions knew, anyone bringing an action for infringement generally went for an injunction, and if an infringement was established an injunction was granted as a matter of course. In almost all other patent cases an injunction was looked upon as an exceptional remedy, and it was never granted unless the ordinary remedies would be inadequate. The Judges several centuries ago, in the reign of James I., treated the infringement of a patent as a contempt of the Royal prerogative upon which the patent was founded, and it was dealt with by the Star Chamber. The Star Chamber had long disappeared, but the injunction was still wielded by the Courts in the same wholesale fashion. He suggested to the right hon. Gentleman that the law should be altered in such a manner that an injunction should not be granted unless, for one thing, it could be shown that ordinary remedies would not meet the case. If this question of injunction were dealt with it would be an important contribution towards what they all desired. Supplemented by that, he thought the system of compulsory licences which was now proposed would effect the desired end. He was glad to see that the Government were dealing with several matters with reference to designs and were laying it down that no designs were to be marked as registered except where there was a subsisting copyright. He would like to go a step further. At present an article might be marked as registered just before the copyright expired. It seemed to him highly desirable that when any person marked a design as registered he should in addition give the year and the number of the registration. That would enable the public to verify the claim and to find out in a simple manner how long a design had still to run. The same arguments applied to the case of patents. He thought it was a rather serious oversight in the Government Bill that the provision which applied to designs did not apply to patents. Section 105 of the Act of 1883 applied to both patents and designs. As the law stood, people could not mark an article as patented unless the patent had been granted; but once granted, they could go on marking it patented after the patent had expired. It would be a very good thing if this were so amended as to restrict the marking of any article as patented to an article which was covered by a subsisting patent, and when the patent expired, the right to mark an article as patented ought to cease. In all patents the date and number ought to be given as part of the marking, because without that information it was often impossible to find what particular patent was referred to. A typewriting machine might be marked as patented, although the only thing covered by the patent might be some simple adjustment for the ribbon. There was a patent case in the House of Lords not long ago concerning a bottle containing mineral water, ginger ale, which had been marked as patented. The patent did not refer to the bottle, which was of a common type, or to the liquid which, he might add, was well known to a large number of Members of the House. What was referred to was a part of the machinery used in aerating the liquid. How was it possible to find out under the present system what the patent really was? Therefore he thought anyone who marked an article as patented should be required to give the date and number in order that the public might be able without much trouble to ascertain its duration and scope. For many years we had treated the term "true and first inventor" as covering a person who imported an invention from a foreign country. The importation of inventions which the importer had come across abroad was a thing of the past, and the effect of that arrangement now was that a person abroad, instead of acting as a British applicant and making the required declaration as to his being the true and first inventor, had the alternative of communicating it to an agent in this country, who could then obtain a patent in his own name for the invention as a "communicated" one, and it had been held repeatedly that in the case of a "communicated," invention no inquiry could be made as to the circumstances under which the communicated invention had been obtained. In the result, if anyone stole an invention, and tried to patent it in the ordinary way, he would very rightly be defeated. But if he crossed the Channel and posted it to an agent, the agent could obtain in his own name a patent for it which could not be challenged on the ground of theft. He hoped that his hon. friends would not think that he was showing people how to steal patents. What was contrary to public morals was not calling the attention of the House to the evil, but the fact that the evil existed. He hoped that when the Bill went into Committee that evil might be removed, and that they might put applications from abroad on precisely the same level in respect of the requirements as to good faith and originality as applications from people in this country. He considered that a patent should not be granted unless the applicant, or one of the applicants, made the ordinary declaration that he believed himself to be the true and first inventor, and that the patent should be upset if a false declaration had been made. He had risen to commend the Bill, and hoped that his right hon. friend would not look upon him as a sort of inverted Balaam because he had tried to temper his commendation with suggestions for improvement. He congratulated his right hon. friend on the way in which he had undertaken the important and difficult task of reforming the patent laws and hoped that the measure would have the happy result of promoting the industrial development of the country.

*MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said that as this question was regarded as one of the greatest importance in the large manufacturing city which he represented, he would like to say a few words upon it. He congratulated the President of the Board of Trade upon dealing by an amending Bill with the present unsatisfactory state of the patent laws. He rejoiced that the right hon. Gentleman had not been frightened by the absurd cry of protection. The debate upon this and other Bills would be simplified if Liberal Members would cease to describe themselves as free traders. They were nothing of the kind. They were simply free importers. He had always been for free trade, but we had not got it. It mystified the question when undue and misleading terms were used. The Bill was designed to secure, not protection but fair play for British traders against the unfair competition of foreigners. The hon. Member for East Northamptonshire seemed to have protection on the brain. The hon. Gentleman's speech satisfied the Opposition completely in the direction of protection as they understood it. Nothing could be more satisfactory to them than the principles the hon. Member had laid down. The hon. Member for Kingston had made an important speech, and he hoped the President of the Board of Trade would give careful attention to the suggestions which he had made. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman was alive to the importance of sparing the inventor, and especially the poor inventor, unnecessary expense in connection with legal proceedings. The poor inventor, when opposed by a rich rival, or by a syndicate, often had not only his purse but his heart broken. He hoped the Government would adhere to Clause 10 of the Bill, which required that articles patented should be manufactured largely, if not exclusively, in this country. If the British Government gave a man a monopoly to supply 42,000,000 of people in this country with a particular article, that man should be compelled to manufacture a large proportion, if not all of them here, so as to employ British labour in their production. That was absolutely fair. If that was protection, all who supported the Bill were protectionists. It would be advantageous if the Government would define more clearly than was done in the Bill what proportion of patented goods should be made in this country, so as to insure that the proportion was substantial. From the point of view of the British inventor and the British workman the arguments of the hon. Member for Chester were unsound, and he hoped the President of the Board of Trade would resist any blandishments as to alleged protection or anything else, and keep in view what would be fair to British inventors, traders, and workmen. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman upon taking this long-delayed amendment of the law in hand, and was confident that the ramifications of its benefits would extend to inventors, commercial men, and workmen. The inventor too often had the advantages which would reward his genius and inventive capacity filched from him by the power of gold. He hoped Parliament would protect the individual against that power.

*Mr. ASTBURY (Lancashire, Southport) said that the hon. Member for the Kingston Division had raised a number of points which were deserving of consideration. The main object of the Bill so far as policy was concerned was contained substantially in the two clauses which provided for compulsory working and compulsory licenses; and so far as those two clauses were concerned, with the exception of some possible criticism as to the Court before which these matters were to come, he was of opinion that they supplied a long-needed want in connection with the great industries of the country. It was an extraordinary thing that from a land where Perkins' Mauve was invented, the colour industry should have passed to a foreign country, and that the country which produced the electro-magnet and the induction coil should have been passed by other countries in the race for the discovery, application, and completion of electrical inventions. He believed that very largely the reason for this was to be found in our patent system and its administration. Surely the object of our patent laws ought to be in the first place to encourage invention as far as possible, in order that scientific research and people who were acquainted with science should be more encouraged in the country and be induced to take more part in developing our industries. The next object, however, was that the monopoly given by a patent should be a monopoly which should be confined to carrying out the intention of the original framers of the Statute of Monopolies, that it should be subservient to the purpose of introducing and working these patented inventions in this country. At present the industries of this country were largely handicapped by the fact that patents could be obtained with great facility by foreign firms and rich corporations, and many minor patents could be taken out subsequent to the main invention, with the result that, having regard to the great expense of patent litigation, be the patents good or bad, 99 out of 100 of the small traders of the country could not suffer the expense of fighting these great foreign corporations and the inventions remained for years unworked here. He wished to add his testimony to the courage and ability of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill in taking up a subject which not only bristled with difficulty but on which there was an enormous difference of opinion. The question of compulsory working had two sides, and there were a large number of people in the country, many of them well qualified to speak, who were bitterly opposed to the notion that we should improve our position by putting the compulsory clause into operation. He was not one of those. He believed that the monopoly which the Crown granted to an inventor ought prima facie to be a monopoly which should be given to and utilised for the benefit of our own industries and our own land. It was said that if that were done it would be a hardship upon the English patentee. He had heard from the hon. Member for Chester and others outside the House that if patents could be revoked because they were only worked outside the country many English inventors who had facilities for working abroad and not at home would be deprived of their patents. The first answer to that was that they were absolutely negligible in number; and, secondly, that if that was the case they ought to be deprived of their grants on the same grounds as a foreigner, if the main object was that the industries of this country should benefit from the monopoly granted. He was far from saying that the Bill entirely carried out the object which the right hon. Gentleman had, but he knew from the way in which the right hon. Gentleman had met the views of many who had seen him that he was only too anxious in Committee that any further improvements that could be suggested in this respect should be adopted. With regard to compulsory licences, there was a class of people who believed that the right way to effect what they desired was by way of compulsory licences rather than by way of compulsory working. His own view was that that was wrong. The right view, as it seemed to him, was that the best results would be obtained by a combination of the two remedies, because there was a vast difference between enforcing compulsory licences—after litigation and after difficulties which must arise in the case of a complicated invention—and the simple expedient which said that if the monopoly was granted and it turned out that at the end of three years this country had not benefited from it as it should that monopoly should cease. With regard to compulsory licences, a question had been raised with regard to the so-called unreasonable contracts which were said to have become a practice chiefly in the boot trade. He did not think the House ought to be asked to say that Clause 16 should be made retrospective. It was hardly in accordance with sound administration that the House should lay down that a large number of existing contracts should be made void. But so far as he could judge from the provisions of Clause 11, any person who was unable to obtain a licence except on terms which were unreasonable or injurious to trade could apply for and obtain a compulsory licence, and if the terms suggested in the contracts mentioned were of the character described the remedy for those who were bound by such existing contracts was to be found under Clause 11. With regard to the machinery of the Bill, under the Designs part of it there was a matter he desired to refer to which was of very great moment to Lancashire, and in which he believed most Lancashire Members took a great interest. More than 50 per cent. of the total designs registered in this country every year were textile designs under the last two classes in the Designs Act; in 1905 the House, in the Trade Marks Amendment Act, established a separate system of cotton marks with a keeper or registrar of those marks in Lancashire who was conversant with the requirements of the firms interested in these matters. The proportion that cotton marks bore to the total trade marks of the country was nothing like so large as the proportion which textile designs bore to designs as a whole. Textile designs were of two classes, either printed or woven, and every year there were registered 10,000 textile designs, of which 7,000 were printed designs. Of these 7,000, more than 6,000 were registered from Manchester, and more than half of the woven designs were from that centre. The universal desire in the textile industries was that there should be a branch registry for textile designs established in Manchester, on the same lines as was done in the case of cotton marks. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill in Committee would allow a clause to be added to the Bill with that object. There was also another matter which he regarded as very important in the administration of the law and the clauses of this Bill in relation to patents. The hon. Member for Kingston had suggested with great force that this very difficult and constantly increasing matter of scientific litigation should now be placed in the hands of a tribunal which was especially conversant with the matters it would have to deal with, and designed for that purpose. The Bill as drawn provided that certain matters on appeal from the Comptroller of Patents should be taken to a Judge nominated by the Lord Chancellor, rather than to the law officers of the Crown. Their duties with regard to patents were really almost intolerable at the present time, and if the Bill passed in its present form the number of appeals would be quadrupled or more, making it quite impossible for the law officers to attempt to deal with them. He suggested that there should be established a scientific or patent and trade marks division of the High Court in the same way as there was established an Admiralty Division. Cases in the Admiralty Division were tried with great facility and dispatch, because of the constant practice there and the continuity in the administration of the law and in its interpretation. Some similar Court for scientific industrial matters would be a great step forward and a necessary step, if full advantage was to be obtained from the objects and provisions of this Bill. But he did not think that it would be desirable that one permanent Judge should be appointed to that Court. He agreed entirely with the hon. and learned Member for Kingston, and for this reason, that it was undesirable in these scientific matters that the law and its administration should get stereotyped and cramped. They wanted the elasticity of different minds coming to these matters from time to time, and if a Division could be established and a Judge nominated to sit in it annually by the Lord Chancellor, it would mark a very great step forward in the administration of our patent laws. If that were done, that Judge, sitting in Chambers, could take all the matters that the law officers at present took, and the same people would have the same right of audience before him when exercising this jurisdiction. It was considered very undesirable by many who were acquainted with the administration of the patent law that the Comptroller should have extended powers, such as were suggested in Clause 6, of refusing the original grant of a patent. He suggested that there the law should remain as it was, and that under Clause 9 the Comptroller should not have power to revoke any patent except on the grounds on which at the present time he could refuse the original grant. He would suggest further that the questions under Clause 10 should go before a Judge of the High Court, and not before the Comptroller. It would be a most delicate and difficult jurisdiction to administer, and he believed it would be cheaper and much more efficient in the long run that these matters should go, in the first instance, before a Judge of the High Court instead of before the Comptroller.

MR. MEYSEY-THOMPSON (Staffordshire, Handsworth) said he rose in no spirit of opposition to the Bill. There was so much that he thought good in it that he desired not to obstruct it but to help it forward and make it as effective as possible. He saw, in looking through the Bill, that there was no provision for extending the period of protection to the patentee, and he urged that something should be done in that direction. He was quite aware that a patentee could apply to the Court for such an extension, but he had no guarantee that he would get it. That bore very hardly, especially on the poor patentee with no great weight of capital with which to bring his invention forward. It took some time to perfect his invention, and a considerable time to bring it before the public, and just about the time when it began to pay, his patent lapsed and somebody else got the benefit of his brains, energy, and enterprise. The benefits accruing from the inventor's brains, energy and enterprise should, however, be secured to him, and he asked the President of the Board of Trade to consider whether it would be possible to introduce a clause increasing the facilities for, and reducing the cost of, obtaining an extended period of protection.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs) thought the Government had every reason to be satisfied with the reception accorded to the Bill in the course of the discussion. There had been substantially no criticism of any leading principle of the Bill. The criticism had been directed against points of detail—very important points, no doubt, but all points which, he thought, could be successfully attended to without in any way destroying the general structure of the measure. He might say, for his part, that he would welcome any suggestions in Committee, and no pride of paternity would prevent him from giving them favourable consideration so long as the leading principle of the Bill was not altogether exterminated. He would refer to only two or three leading points that had been raised in the course of the debate. As to the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Handsworth, it seemed to be fair, under the circumstances he had mentioned, that they should have, at any rate, the power to apply to some tribunal to grant an extension of the patentee's monopoly and privilege. The patentee could now, under Section 25 of the Consolidating Act, apply to the Privy Council. The only criticism that might be passed on that process was that it was a very expensive tribunal, and he was prepared to consider whether it was possible to simplify and cheapen the method of applying for an extension under these circumstances. They wanted, if it were possible, to cheapen the whole process. At the present moment it was almost prohibitive, and it was certainly prohibitive for the poor inventor, who was either denied justice altogether or compelled to part with his patent to the first capitalist that came along. That was a very unfortunate state of things. He was glad to observe that legal gentlemen inside and outside the House showed for the poor inventor a keen anxiety which was very creditable, and he was very glad to see that the hon. Member for Chester had also joined them. He desired to say, before he proceeded to any of the other criticisms, how much he thanked his hon. and learned friend the Member for Southport, than whom there was no higher authority, either inside the House or out of it, on these matters, not only for the suggestions he had made that afternoon, but also for the very great assistance he rendered to him before he introduced the Bill. The noble Lord the Member for Horsham had suggested that they should not make the deposit of samples under Clause 2 compulsory in all cases. As a matter of fact, that was provided for already. It was never intended that every patentee of a chemical invention should be compelled to deposit samples. It was left entirely in the discretion of the Registrar, and the provision was much more elastic than the German regulations in that respect. Clause 6, which had been criticised, was entirely in the interests of the inventor. It was intended to cover a case of this kind. They might have an application for a patent which had not been covered by any previous grant. It was, however, thoroughly well known that it was a process in respect of which a patent had been issued in another country and full particulars of which had been published in this country. But, although that was known to all the parties, it could not be referred to in the hearing before the Comptroller, and the result was that the Comptroller was obliged to grant a patent which was in itself an invalid patent, and when they came to the subsequent hearing before the Court, the whole grant had to be revoked. It would be better if, in the first instance, a patent of that kind could be alluded to, and that the Comptroller should have discretion, in a clear case of that sort, to refuse a patent. The present system was simply a premium on litigation.

Sir E. CARSON (Dublin University) asked whether the appeal in that case would go to the law officers or to the Judge.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE said his own interpretation was that it would go before the law officers; but he was prepared favourably to consider the suggestion which had been thrown out that it would be far better if the whole of the appeals were taken before the special Judge who was to be allocated to this purpose. He might say that it was rather his intention, even before the debate of that afternoon, to introduce an Amendment to that effect in the Bill. He thought it would be an improvement. With regard to Clause 10, there again the criticism had not been directed against the principle. The hon. Member for Merthyr had put down an Amendment, and then, very characteristically, if he might say so, having seen it well advertised in the Press, ran away from it. He was not at all surprised, because he knew his hon. friend pretty well. But apart from this firing at a long distance there had been no hostile criticism. The hon. Member for Chester brushed aside at once very effectively the suggestion that this had anything whatever to do with the merits of the great fiscal controversy. Therefore he would not go into that, as he had not been challenged. All the criticisms against Section 10 had been criticisms upon points of detail. Those would be threshed out in Committee, and he did not think it would serve any useful purpose for him now to give a final answer to suggestions which had been thrown out, and which he had to consider very carefully, because he agreed with the hon. Member for Southport that this was a very difficult problem altogether. Then he came to the point with regard to the allocation of a special Judge. He was not at all surprised that the hon. Member for Richmond did not agree altogether upon that, because it would be a very serious thing if they had a Judge who was not quite adapted to the work—and accidents of that kind had happened—a Judge who would be set up in a kind of special statutory Court, and who could not well be moved. The point would be considered very carefully; but they had felt that on the whole the best plan was to proceed experimentally, and to get a special Judge assigned for the purpose. Of course he could see the advantage of it. If they went to different Judges to try patent cases, they had to waste an enormous amount of time in explaining to them the very elements which a Judge trying these things constantly would take for granted. Having a special Judge they would save time, and that meant saving expense. He was sure they would save at least two-thirds of the time spent on these cases if they had a Judge specially versed in them. They proposed, therefore, to start by allocating a Judge especically for the purpose, and he was not sure that something might not be done during the Committee stage in the way of altering the rules and things of that kind, which would in effect set up a special Court, without doing it in so many words. Now he came to the important question which had been raised with regard to Clause 16—the avoidance of certain conditions attached to the sale, etc., of patented articles. It was no secret that that was put in very largely owing to the remarkable character of the contract which was forced upon the boot and shoe industry by an American firm. Nine-tenths of the boot and shoe manufacturers of this country were practically bound hand and foot by that contract. It would be a very serious matter if another invention was to come in, effecting a great saving of time and expense, and they could not take advantage of it, for they might be beaten out of the market altogether. That was a state of things which they could not possibly contemplate, and it made no difference at all whether the firm was British or American. After all, a patent was a privilege granted by the Crown, and Parliament had a right to declare the conditions under which the monopoly should be granted. He had been pressed to make the clause retrospective, but it was a very serious thing to introduce into an Act of Parliament a provision which would invalidate contracts, and nothing but a great public necessity would justify it. In this case he did not think it ought to be done, except under conditions which would protect the inventor as well. The possessor of these patents had entered into a large number of contracts with manufacturers, and no doubt when he came to settle the terms upon which he let his machines be made he would take into account the security which that contract gave him for a good many years to come. It was an asset. He might have raised a considerable amount of capital, and if he knew that the contract he was entering into was void, he probably would have asked for a bigger royalty, and at any rate he was entitled to reconsider his position with those who entered into the contract with him. After all, they must be fair to all parties. He was not sure that, if they said that certain clauses in a contract should be void, it would be quite fair to future purchasers of that machine. When the syndicate owning the patent knew that they could not enter into a similar contract they might say that in future they would demand a higher royalty. It would be unfair to those who entered into contracts in future if they had to pay more for the machine than those who had entered into the contract already and had been liberated by Act of Parliament. He agreed that something ought to be done. His hon. and learned friend thought that Clause 11 met the case, but he was not sure that it met the whole case, and he was prepared to consider any Amendments that might be moved to meet it so long as those contracts were invalidated under conditions which would be perfectly fair to both parties. In regard to a special office in Manchester, though he could not at present give a pledge, he rather thought they would be able to meet the case. It would be a great convenience to the Manchester manufacturers to be able on the spot to examine the designs instead of coming up to London. He would consider it very fully, and he thought it could be accomplished. He had now dealt with nearly all the criticisms passed on the Bill, including those of the hon. Member for Bordesley. He agreed with the right hon. Member that what they wanted was fair play and justice to British industries. [Sir Howard Vincent: Hear, hear.] He thought that would appeal to the hon. and gallant Gentleman. At present some of the powerful foreign trusts were able to bring pressure to bear, by their great financial resources, to prevent bona fide inventions taking root in this country to begin with. They crushed them in their infancy by legal action. It was a case where they practically drove some branches of British industry out of the field altogether, as it were, because they were never allowed to start at all. He trusted that when this Bill was passed they would be able to put an end to that practice for ever.

MR. BONAR LAW (Camberwell, Dulwich) said that, as the only Member on the Opposition side of the House who had been connected with the Board of Trade, he naturally followed closely measures which came from that Department. On personal grounds he had legitimate cause of grievance against the President of the Board of Trade. It was the duty of the Opposition to oppose, and his colleagues had no reason to complain that their activity in that respect had been interfered with by the members of the Government. His colleagues had opposed, and had enjoyed their opposition. He also would have enjoyed opposing, but he had not had the opportunity, for hitherto he had only been able to play the very uninteresting rôle of supporting the measures brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman. That really pointed to what was a recognised fact, that trade questions were not in any sense Party questions; and he was sure the right hon. Gentleman would admit that from the Opposition he had received not only no factious obstruction on trade questions, but a measure of support which was not usual. In regard to this Bill, he entirely approved of the objects which the right hon. Gentleman aimed at, and to a very large extent of the methods by which he intended to carry them out. In regard to the Court before which these patent cases were to be tried there was a good deal to be said for the view of the hon. Member for Chester. The issues involved in these cases were often enormously large, they could be taken from one Court to another, and it seemed unfit that a question that involved millions should be finally settled by one Judge. But in all these cases there was a balance of advantage and disadvantage, and personally he thought the balance of advantage on the whole distinctly was that the cost of securing patents should be made as low as possible. Therefore, it was at least worth while trying to have such cases tried before one Judge, who, as the right hon. Gentleman had promised, would be specially devoted to the work and specially competent to develop it. The second point to which he wished to refer was that mentioned in Clause 2 of the Bill, which had relation to the conditions on which patents for chemicals were to be granted in future. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly just to his noble friend on this point. He did not think the Bill, as it at present stood, gave the protection which the right hon. Gentleman thought it gave. What ought to be done was to give the Comptroller power, provisionally at least, to grant protection long enough to enable the inventor to secure sufficient financial support from capitalists. As the right hon. Gentleman had pointed out in introducing the Bill, Germany had practically a monopoly in many branches of the chemical industry. Where that monopoly was due to superior methods, there was no ground for complaint. It was the fair spoil of Germany's bow and spear. But, however obtained, that monopoly had been confirmed and strengthened by this country's patent laws. They had this effect—that a syndicate or large capitalist would take out a patent to cover much ground without working it at all. Therefore, inventors were prevented from going in that direction at all. In Germany the patentee was not allowed to cover the same amount of ground, and, therefore, the field was left much more open to competition. We should adopt the same system in this country. As to the clause preventing contracts similar to those which now prevailed in the boot trade in this country, he admitted that it was a strong measure to interfere with contracts deliberately entered into by business men who knew what they were doing. But these contracts were in a special position. The man who made these conditions was only able to make them by means of the special privilege given by our laws; and, therefore, it was reasonable to take care that that especial privilege was not used detrimentally to the interests of this country. But he agreed that it would be unfair to make the clause retrospective, and it seemed to go further than was necessary to meet such cases. If that were true, and if he was right in his view, the industries affected would certainly make representations to the Board of Trade, and he was sure that the Department would give them every consideration. The only other point in the Bill was as to compulsory working. The right hon. Gentleman showed that he was disappointed that the hon. Member for Merthyr had not brought forward his Amendment, but if the President of the Board of Trade was disappointed, he himself was much more disappointed. If the President of the Board of Trade had not made an epoch-making invention, he had certainly become the apostle of a new faith on the other side of the House. He had looked forward in this debate to something in the nature of a heresy-hunt; and it would have been very interesting if the hon. Member for Merthyr had persisted, for a heresy, to be effective, must come from one's own household. With the best will in the world towards the right hon. Gentleman, he was bound to say that he could not see his way to defend him against the hon. Member for Merthyr, for in this matter the right hon. Gentleman was undoubtedly a heretic. This was essentially a Bill that sapped the whole theory on which our present fiscal system rested. What was the root theory of our present fiscal system? That it was our interest to get any products consumed in this country from any quarter of the world where they were produced to the best advantage, without regard to whether or not they were produced in this country. The right hon. Gentleman said that a patent was entirely different; that it was a monopoly, and that we had a right in granting the monopoly to see that it was used to the advantage of this country. That was true. But the question was not one of right. We had a right to put on an import duty if we thought it to our advantage. It was merely a question of interest. Apply that principle to a patented article. Leave it to the free play of economic forces, and what happened? The foreign patentee produced in this country if it paid him, and he produced abroad if it paid him. Let him produce abroad, and let us pay for it by those goods which we could produce with advantage here—since goods must always be paid for with goods. If that were sound theory, why compel the foreign patentee to produce here? There could be only one answer—that, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, it was in the interest of this country that these things should be produced at home. If that were so as regarded the question of principle, there was no difference whatever whether the result were produced in one way or another. If it were right to produce the result by patent laws, it was equally right to produce it by import duties. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out that America alone had not insisted upon patents being worked in America. He felt sure that everyone in the House knew the reason for that, because it was perfectly obvious. When he was at the Board of Trade he happened to see a document which came from a member of the American Government dealing with the compulsory working of patents. This was the substance of what the writer said—"What is your object," asked the writer, "in having things compulsorily made? It is to get them made in the United States. What is the most effective way of securing that end? Why fool about with patent laws? If you want them made in the United States put on a duty, and the things will be made in the United States." The right hon. Gentleman's system, then, was more protective than the system of the United States, for he made the production in this country universal. The right hon. Gentleman really adopted the principle which insisted that the system should be applied not only to the articles which we were adapted to produce, but that the articles which we were not able to produce should be made in this country provided they were the objects of a patent. ["No."] For the views which he personally held on this question he had received the greatest possible encouragement from the present Government. That encouragement had come from two quarters. First, from the Secretary of State for War, who was supposed to represent high thinking in the Cabinet, although he did not know whether his colleagues in the Cabinet took that view. A few weeks ago the right hon. Gentleman made the curious statement that the law of free trade depended on circumstances; it was not applied at all times; it was a question of the conditions of the country that imposed it and the conditions of the country which wished to trade. That was an important admission. Let hon. Members cast their minds back to their election speeches at the general election. [Cries of "Order."] Was that too great an effort? Then let them try to imagine what those speeches would be like if subject to the condition laid down by the Secretary for War. They could not talk about the consumer paying the duty, nor about the universal advantages of free trade; and then he would like to hear a speech from the right hon. Gentleman and to enjoy the privilege of answering him. Secondly, the Opposition had received another encouragement from the President of the Board of Trade, who represented the practical spirit in the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had lived up to the precept of the Secretary for War. He had treated every Question in his department as being one of expediency; he had looked at every question and had dealt with it from its own point of view, and nothing else. What was the result? Last session the right hon. Gentleman passed a Bill, a beautiful Bill, which had the effect, and it was intended to have the effect, of protecting the shipping industry, not against foreign competition, but against unfair foreign competition, which was the only kind of protection the opponents of the Government had any sympathy with. Now in this Bill which the right hon. Gentleman was piloting through the House he had gone a long step further, for it undoubtedly, in principle, sapped the foundation on which the whole of our fiscal system was based. [MINISTERIAL Cries of "No, no."]

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir W. ROBSON, South Shields) said that in this Bill the Government were concerned about the general trade of the country, and they were dealing with the patent law, which was essentially a protectionist law, with sufficient and excellent excuse. It was necessary to give a particular kind of protection here in order to stimulate invention; and the fact was that the patent law was protectionist in a more severe degree than any tariff could possibly be, because it was practically prohibitive against the manufacture of certain things except under certain conditions. That being so, this Bill proposed to restrict the rights of monopolists whom the patent law had created; yet because the Government proposed to restrict the rights of monopoly they were told that they were deserting the cause of free trade.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Never mind that.

SIR W. ROBSON said the hon. Gentleman asked for an application of the free play of economic forces to patent articles; but patent articles were wholly withdrawn from the free play of such forces. That was one of the reasons why the Government had introduced these clauses. Under the existing law proprietors of foreign patents had attached as conditions in the exercise and use of inventions in this country certain very onerous terms, such as—

> "If you use our machine you can use no other for creating this particular commodity;"

and—

> "You shall not avail yourself of any other invention."

There might be a new device invented which would revolutionise the trade of the country, but many manufacturers were incapacitated from availing themselves of that invention. There was not only this prohibition of the free play of economic forces, but there was also a serious impediment to trade and invention, by the use to which a particular class of foreign monopolist had put his patent. It could not be said, therefore, that the Government were deserting the cause of free trade when they restricted the power of such a monopolist as that, and asked for a fairer latitude to be given to the trader who was obliged by law to go to that particular vendor for the machinery that he wanted. On one occasion he had seen an agreement which imposed restrictions on the British users of a particular class of machine. The contract was made for twenty years, though the period of the patent was for fourteen years only, so that the American inventor by that device had in effect secured a prolongation of his patent. It was clear, therefore, that this legislation of the Government made for more freedom and less protection.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said that he did not care what the Party supporting the Government called themselves as long as they brought in Bills like this, designed to assist the manufacturing industry of the country. He thought that the whole-hearted support of the Opposition should go out to the Government in their present effort, and he thanked the President of the Board of Trade for the great pains he had taken to master a difficult subject and to protect our inventors. Nothing could be more unfortunate in our manufacturing industry than to see how impossible it was for our inventors to derive profit from their inventions, especially in the case of men with restricted means. Any measure which simplified the patent law and secured to a man the product of his own invention was one to be approved. He was quite sure that the great mass of the people of Sheffield would be grateful to the President of the Board of Trade for the pains he had taken in regard to this matter.

*MR. RADFORD (Islington, E.) said that as nearly all the things he had intended to say had been already said he had very little to trouble the House with. He did not propose to discuss whether Clause 10 was free trade or protection, but he wished to point out one or two important results of it. For the first time in this country there was going to be introduced what was known as compulsory working. That system had been tried in many countries abroad, but it had been abandoned as a failure where tried. There was no compulsory working in the United States nor in the Commonwealth of Australia. If manufacture or compulsory working of the patent was to be enforced in this country, he thought it would be a serious matter for the poor inventor. He would like to remind the House how far they had advanced since 1902. In that year a Conservative Government passed a Patents Act under which it was provided that if a manufactured article was manufactured mainly or exclusively outside the United Kingdom the patent might be revoked, but only in cases where the reasonable requirements of the public had not been satisfied. It was left for a Liberal Government in 1907 to bring forward a proposal, with the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bordesley division, that a patent should be revoked, although the demands of the public were satisfied, simply because the patented article was manufactured abroad, and he thought that was an advance which ought to be noted by the House. It was the habit of our Colonies periodically to go through our Statute-book and adopt those measures which they thought advantageous to themselves, and it was extremely likely, if this Bill became law, that in the course of a few years nearly all our Colonies would adopt it. Then in our Colonies a condition of the validity of a patent would be that the patented article should be manufactured in the Colony where it was granted. He did not know whether manufacturers here were prepared to face that contingency. It appeared to him to be a heavy responsibility to take. Further than that, foreign countries would retaliate by having an equivalent of Clause 10 in their patent laws. The result would be that every manufacturer who set out with the intention of supplying the world would have to be prepared to establish a factory in every British Colony and in every foreign country. That would involve a great addition to the cost of manufacture, and, of course, an enhancement of the price to the consumer. He doubted whether Clause 10 was well advised, and he hoped that it would receive further consideration. Clauses 6 and 9 afforded grounds for litigation which made him shudder, and he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman in the interest of the poor inventor to reconsider that matter. He had known poor inventors who had become rich as the result of their ingenuity and prudence, but he was satisfied that if Clauses 6 and 9 remained in the Bill in their present form, the fortunes which inventors had hitherto made would in future be transferred to rich corporations.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Standing Committee.

Referring to the following instruction of which the hon. Member for Kingston had given notice, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert in the Bill provisions for establishing a special tribunal for the hearing of all actions and proceedings relating to patents"—

*MR. SPEAKER said: If by that the hon. Member intends the allocation of all patent matters to one particular Judge, that can be done under the Bill as it stands now, but if he goes beyond that, and intends to constitute a special division of the High Court of Justice to deal with patent matters, that would be beyond the scope of the Bill.

In reference to the following notices—

MR. WATSON RUTHERFORD: After Second Reading of Patents and Designs Bill, to move, That it be an Instruction to the Committee to insert provisions that the patent granted in the United Kingdom to or on trust for any foreigner as a communication from abroad shall be ipso facto determined on the determination of the patent in the foreigner's own country from any cause whatever.

LORD BALCARRES: After Second Reading of Patents and Designs Bill, to move, That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they consider the desirability of hearing counsel and examining witnesses with regard to Part II. of the Bill—

*MR. SPEAKER said: These instructions being mandatory are both out of order. No mandatory instructions can be given to a Committee of the Whole House, or to a Standing Committee.

MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) said he understood that the Bill did not give power to relegate all patent matters to a Judge. The present state of the law was that every application for a revocation was bound to go before a Judge. This Bill proposed to abolish that system and invest the Comptroller with power to deal with such cases. The instruction of which his hon. and learned friend had given notice was that there should be a Judge to whom all matters under this Bill should be referred. At present the Bill only gave the Judge power to deal with certain cases under the Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: An Amendment can be moved in the Committee Stage to transfer to a Judge those matters proposed to be sent to the Comptroller.

MR. CAVE said that what he desired was that the Committee should have power to consider the question of referring to a Judge, or a Division of the High Court, not only arising matters under this Bill, but all patent matters. While that was no doubt outside the clauses of the Bill, he thought it was within the general scope and intention of the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: I think that is beyond the scope of the Bill which is to "amend the law relating to patents and designs." The hon. Member proposes to go beyond that.

BUTTER AND MARGARINE BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE TREASURER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Sir EDWARD STRACHEY, Somersetshire, S.), in moving the Second Reading of the Bill, said he believed he was right in saying that of all the numerous Bills which had been introduced on this subject, only one went before a Standing Committee, and that no Bill had ever got any further than that stage. He hoped that a more fortunate fate awaited this Bill. The present measure differed a good deal from the Bills which had been introduced into the House each year from 1902 to 1905. It was a more far-reaching Bill than any of its predecessors, and, though it went much further, he hoped that it would meet with a better fate. It was founded upon the Report of a Select Committee over which he had presided last session. That Committee sat a great number of times and heard a great deal of evidence, and made a practically unanimous Report to the House. While previous Bills simply dealt with the addition of moisture to butter this Bill went much further. There had been, he regretted to say, a great deal of adulteration and "faking" of butter. In fact the present state of things was so critical that unless something was done very soon to prevent natural butter from being adulterated, the people of this country would have no choice but to eat adulterated or faked butter made either at home or abroad. Some of the evidence given before the Committee was of the most extraordinary nature, showing how it paid to adulterate butter. Mr. Butler, who represented the Wilts United Creamery Company of Devizes, stated that overtures had been made to him offering a process of adulteration which should not be open to detection, but which would increase their present profits by £5,000 a year. Further Mr. Butler said that his company in face of such competition must either themselves fake butter or close their creamery. In a case taken against the Bridgwater Creamery Company only recently, it was admitted that the profits made by adding lardine to butter were £5,650 in fifteen months. Such a state of things proved that there was a very real need for this Bill, which aimed at stopping the adulteration of butter at its source. Previous Bills were aimed at the seller or retailer; this measure went to the source. The innocent retailer was the man who first of all was shot at in previous Bills; he had to prove that he was innocent; he had to prove that it was through no fault of his own that the adulteration had taken place. Even if he did prove his innocence and was able to throw back the blame on the right person, yet he had all the trouble of proving his innocence. It was in the interest of the retailers of the country who were liable to be unjustly accused of adulterating their butter that adulteration should be stopped at its source. The principle of the Bill had been approved of by the producers of butter throughout the country. The Central Chamber of Agriculture had unanimously approved of the principle of the Bill, and he might say that practically the same attitude had been taken up by the Grocers' Federation and the Butter Association, while objecting to some of its provisions. The Nottingham District Association at first strongly objected to the Bill and asked its local Members to oppose it. After the provisions had been explained to the Association, they passed a Resolution rescinding a previous Resolution, and being now content with the Bill as it stood, they had asked their Members to support it. He would explain very shortly the clauses, for there had been a good deal of misunderstanding as to what was the real effect of the Bill. The first clause provided that the existing law as regarded the registration of margarine factories should be applied to butter factory premises for the manufacture of butter substitutes. The second subsection of the clause provided that in the case of imitation butters, or butter substitutes, a register should be kept as to where these were sent to. Sub-section 3, following out a recommendation made by the Select Committee, provided that no premises could be used as a butter factory which formed any part of or communicated with a margarine factory. It had been pointed out to him that in certain cases of creameries in Scotland they would be treated harshly under that particular provision because they might become butter factories. He thought that it might be possible to give exemption to those existing creameries in Scotland, under certain conditions, to be made by the Board of Agriculture on the ground that they had proved a great advantage to the farmers in the neighbourhood who sent their milk to these creameries. It had been represented to him that unless these exemptions were given, the alterations on the premises otherwise required would be so expensive that they would have to be shut up altogether. That proposal of his showed that they did not wish to deal harshly with such creameries. Clause 2, as to the inspection of factories by an officer of the Board of Agriculture was important. The powers of inspection of premises under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act would apply to factories for the manufacture of butter, margarine, margarine cheese, or other imitation butter. Provision was also made that officers duly authorised by the local authority, such as the medical officer, the sanitary inspector, or the inspector of weights and measures, or a police constable, to procure samples under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, might enter the premises used as a butter factory. That was a provision recommended by the Select Committee on the butter trade. No such power was proposed in the case of premises referred to in (b) of Sub-clause (1) of Clause 1, so that there might be no risk of revealing the trade secrets of these places. Sub-section 3 of Clause 2 was the only part of the Bill which applied to creameries and farm houses. That sub-section enabled the Board of Agriculture, where they had reason to suppose that an illegitimate business was being done, to send an officer with special authorisation to inspect the premises in order to see that no fraudulent trade was being carried on there. Clause 3 dealt with another recommendation of the Select Committee. An adulterant was produced by adding a certain amount of acid to milk, by which 8 lbs. of curd were obtained from 100 lbs. of milk at a cost of 7d. per lb. That curd could be used as a cheap adulterant. The object of this clause was to prevent any such curd, or oil, or fat capable of being used as an adulterant being brought into or kept in a butter factory. Clause 4, as indeed nearly all the other clauses in the Bill, was based on the unanimous recommendations of the Select Committee, and dealt with the limit of water permissible in factory butter and margarine, and other butter substitutes. No butter or margarine which contained more than 16 per cent. of water could be sent out of a butter or margarine factory. Valid objection had been taken to the wording of this clause, and it was proposed that it should be altered so as to make it plain that it applied only to the finished article which was packed and ready for consignment. The existing law in regard to farmhouse and creamery butter was not altered, either for Great Britain or Ireland.

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) asked if the hon. Gentleman was aware that under the instructions of the Board of Agriculture in Ireland farmers in that country had actually been prosecuted for having in their possession butter containing more than 16 per cent. of water.

*Sir EDWARD STRACHEY said that those prosecutions must have taken place under regulations made under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899. It was a complete misapprehension that it was proposed to alter by this Bill the law in regard to farmhouse butter; the Bill as it stood did not alter the law in any respect as to farmhouse or creamery butter. It was only in the case of wilfully increasing the moisture himself that the farmer was liable to a penalty. Clause 8, which dealt with the sale of butter mixtures and imitation butter, was based upon the recommendations of the Select Committee. The sale of these substances, which met the wants and suited the tastes of certain sections of the public, was not prohibited, but precautions were taken that they were not sold under the name of butter. The description and name would have to be approved by the Board. They had no right to refuse permission to traders to deal in an article which was not subject to the objection that it was unwholesome, and the Committee's view was expressed in Paragraph 30 which he would read—

> "Your Committee think it would not be desirable to prohibit the manufacture or sale of the substance known as milk-blended butter, as it appears that this substance meets the wants or suits the tastes of a certain section of the community; but they consider that it is not butter; that it and other substances (not being margarine) containing butter fat, should only be allowed to be manufactured for sale under a special name and regulations approved by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries; and that when sold by retail it should be delivered to the purchaser in a wrapper, also approved by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries. It would be necessary that factories where this mixture is made, and the premises of wholesale dealers who deal in it, should be registered, and that books should be kept on these factories and premises by which consignments of this mixture could be traced to the retailer."

The Government agreed with that view of the Committee, that the public had a right to buy any article if they knew what they were buying and what was its true value, but it should not be sold to them as butter. Therefore precautions were taken in the Bill, in regard to the sale and description of butter substitutes, to prevent them being sold under the name of butter. The description and name would have to be approved by the Board, and it would then be impossible to describe "milk-blended" butter in various forms as butter. The ignorant consumer who knew nothing about percentages might think the fact of the blending with pure English full-cream milk increased the value as butter. The fact that it contained 24 per cent. of water would convey nothing to his mind. He could assure the House that under the provisions of the Bill no description or name which would lead the public to believe that a butter substitute was genuine butter would be allowed by the Board of Agriculture. Under the proposal of the Bill every man would have to produce his butter substitute and give his description of it and the name would have to be approved by the Board. There was no idea of allowing men who applied to register butter substitutes to place all their articles under the same name and description. Every case would have to be dealt with on its merits, and while the article would not be allowed to be sold as butter he could assure the House that it was not intended that the name should be such as would unfairly prejudice the sale of an article. The object was that the butter substitute should be sold as what it really was and not as butter, and that the farmer should have a right to his own trade mark of "butter" which ought not to be infringed by the sale as butter of a substance which was not the genuine article. Clause 5, dealing with imported butter, increased the maximum penalty in certain cases from £20 for the first offence to a fine of three times the value of the butter. In view of the large consignments imported this was advisable as a consignment might be so large as to make the £20 fine inadequate. The more stringent provisions in regard to imported butter had provoked some criticisms. The presumption would be against the importer in the event of the Government chemist certifying against the butter, and he would have to prove that the butter was not adulterated. In regard to imported butter, that was not unfair, because there was no power of inspection during its manufacture as in the case of English butter. Clause 7 contained a new provision requiring that margarine should be so described in advertisements, and Clause 9 applied the penalties of the Food and Drugs Act to offences under this Act. There would, he hoped, be general agreement on the principle of the Bill to which he asked the House to give a Second Reading in order that it might go to the Standing Committee, where its details could be thoroughly threshed out and discussed. As to those details he did not pretend that the Bill was an inspired document, and he was quite ready to be convinced in regard to any alterations which it might be desirable to make. He could assure the House that the only object of the Government was to put down the gross frauds now being perpetrated in the butter trade. He begged to move.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) had no doubt there would be a majority in favour of the Bill, because it had the practically unanimous recommendation of the Committee; but he took the opportunity of saying there were grave defects in it; for instance, the unnecessary stringent and restrictive clauses in regard to factory butter and the extraordinary provision for 24 per cent., not 16 per cent., of moisture in butter substitutes.

*SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: Not sold as butter.

MR. FLYNN said the Department of Agriculture took power by regulation to prevent the sale as butter. The Bill was to protect the consumer against fraud, corruption and dishonesty, and against unfair foreign competition; but the provision in respect to milk-blended butter was not drawn in conformity with the recommendation of the Committee, and certainly not with the overwhelming evidence given before the Committee, because with the exception of one or two specious witnesses who tried to prove that this water-logged butter was not so bad after all and that the poor people who bought it were not misled, the evidence was all the other way. In Committee Irish Members would do their best to improve the Bill in that respect. As to margarine, there would not be much difference of opinion. The evidence given of ingenious malpractices showed that, though the advocates of margarine contended that it was wholesome, nutritious, and palatable, yet they wanted to sell it under some other name. The whole idea was to mislead the consumer. Beyond question there was a difference of opinion among Irish Members and farmers as to the percentage of moisture that should be allowed in butter and what was called Irish salt firkin butter. Some of his colleagues were very pertinacious in regard to that subject, but he, as a representative of a butter-producing constituency, asked the Government to stand firm and not to allow the exclusion of any Irish-made butter from the 16 per cent. limit. No friend of the Irish farmer or of the Irish dairy trade would consent to place such a stigma upon Irish butter, which had such a high reputation and character among the butters of the world. All the efforts of modern manufacturers had been in the direction of producing butter with less moisture in it. And every representative of that school of thought who twelve months ago was in favour of 20 per cent. of moisture was now in favour of the smaller percentage of 15 or 16. Only recently Members of the Irish Butter Trade Association had seen the necessity of protecting their butter from unfair competition, and were now prepared to accept 16 per cent. all round.

MR. LUNDON (Limerick, E.) said he did not intend to take up the valuable time of the House with a lengthy discourse on the Bill, but as one of the Members of the Committee who sat on this question for three months of last year under the Chairmanship of the hon. Baronet the Member for Somerset, who with such patience, such clearheadness, and such ability, discharged his onerous duties, he might be able to place a few useful facts before the House. The main outlines of the Bill were based on the recommendations of the Committee, and were it not for the speech of the hon. Member for North Cork, he would not have risen on that occasion. Clause 19 of the Committee's recommendations said—

> "In this connection, the exemption of Irish salt firkin butter from the 16 per cent. standard of moisture, frequent references were made by witnesses to the manufacture of salt firkin butter by Irish farmers on hill-side farms. This butter is a special article made with brine. The object of adding brine is to preserve the butter and to give it a flavour which is appreciated by consumers in certain districts.
> "Numerous witnesses expressed the opinion that no special exemption as to salt firkin butter manufactured by Irish farmers is desirable. Your Committee concur in this view.
> "They think that the existing law should be sufficient to prevent the manufacture by farmers in Ireland of salt firkin butter containing an unreasonable or fraudulent amount of moisture, and so far as this kind of butter is concerned they do not recommend any further legislation."

The provisions of the Bill as it now stood were not too stringent in dealing with the dangerous and evil practices of those counterfeiting butter. Some of the witnesses examined in Committee gave very sad evidence of the terrible doings resorted to by designing, dishonest traders. The Bill, with some slight modifications, or perhaps changes, to express more clearly the import of some of its provisions, was a very good Bill. The hon. Member for North Cork seemed to think he had a right to speak for Ireland all over, but he represented only the views of the merchants, the gombeen merchants, of Cork, and the majority of the farmers of his own constituency, if the truth were known, would prefer that both systems, the old one of farmers making the butter in their own dairies, and the new system of the creameries, should run concurrent; and naturally so, as the competition would create higher prices. He (Mr. Lundon) spoke for the farmers of the county Limerick, for those of Clare, Tipperary, and of other counties, who had, through their county councils, their district councils, corporations, and other public bodies, sent, from time to time, resolutions passed unanimously by, in the majority of cases, practical farmers, repudiating the hard and fast line of a 16 per cent. standard of moisture in Irish salt firkin butter. Would the House make a law depriving the honest farmers of the county Clare, in which from Killaloe to Loop Head only two creameries existed, of the right of making their butter in the best way they could so as to meet their requirements and pay their rents? In the county Tipperary, just outside where he lived, from the eastern boundary of his constituency to Toomevara, and from Dundrum to Nenagh, about forty miles either way, in that sixteen hundred square miles of elevated tableau of mountain ranges, some twenty miles away from railways, there were only about a half-dozen creameries, one in Reigh, one in Kilcommon, one in Hollyford, and one near Upperchurch or Glastragan, with one or two others farther east. If this 16 per cent. standard was to be adopted according to the great genius of the hon. Member for North Cork, what became of the brave and industrious men of north and mid Tipperary? It was the butter merchants of Cork who first attempted the ruin of the Irish butter trade. Some years ago they shipped first-class Irish butter to Denmark, and under a Copenhagen brand transhipped it to London, placing it on the counters in the latter place as Danish butter, and exposing alongside it third-class Irish butter in firkins with a first-class brand: thus, by a mean trade dodge, ruining the reputation of a splendid article so as to make money by a fraudulent transaction. This thing soon came to an end, but they next resorted to the bringing over to Cork of Copenhagen firkins, which in turn went down, and the third move resulted in branding in the stores the Cork-made firkins as Copenhagen, and sending them down even to county Limerick with money in advance to secure the trade in that county in opposition to the butter-buyers of Limerick and Tipperary. So much for the magnanimity of the Cork butter merchants, now so strenuously championed by the hon. Member for North Cork. The real meaning of this advocacy of the 16 per cent. standard was that, if it should become law, the farmers of the south and west of Ireland, not having modern appliances to ensure their being capable of bringing their butter below the legal requirement, would be driven to the alternative of selling their commodity in the lump butter markets. The unsalted butter being a perishable article would, on occasions, be bought by the agents from Cork at perhaps 25 per cent. below its value, and thence taken to the Cork factories, would be rehashed up and exported to London when butter might be in demand, but at slack times cold stored without any date on the labels and sent out, only to meet the high prices when the quality might have deteriorated. So much for the paternal care of a splendid Irish product on the part of the Cork merchants and their worthy representative in that House. So persistently did they hold out that Cork was everything that their conduct would aptly fit in with the rhyme—

Cork so high and Cork so low;
Cork so tender and Cork so tough,
Of Cork, God knows, we have got enough.

The solicitude of the Cork men over the character of Irish butter was mainly in their breeches pocket. He hoped that the hon. Baronet, with some slight but necessary alterations in the Bill, would succeed in stopping the flood of villainy being practiced under the mixing of margarine, milk-blended butter, and other counterfeits, to the detriment of the pure and genuine article.

And, it being a quarter-past Eight of the clock, Further Proceeding was postponed without Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 4.

ADMIRALTY ADMINISTRATION.

*MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis) rose to call attention to the Admiralty administration, and to move: "That this House, while recognising the services rendered by the Admiralty, regrets to observe evidence of ill-considered changes vitally affecting the war readiness of the Navy; the House is of opinion that its control over the Navy in recent years has been, and is being, weakened by the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty from the House of Commons, by undue secrecy, by sudden changes of policy, and by Admiralty officials resorting to novel methods for the purpose of influencing public opinion." In moving this Resolution, he desired to state that he had not the slightest personal hostility to the Board of Admiralty, though he had been informed that feelings of hostility had been imputed to him. If that charge were really true, he would be guilty of great ingratitude after the kindness, courtesy, and consideration with which he had been treated by the Board. Because he had asked a Question about Sir John Fisher it did not follow that he was prompted by hostile feeling towards that distinguished Admiral. He objected to the Admiralty resorting to secret methods, and had the House been asked to vote a salary of £5,000 a year to Sir John Fisher he would gladly have supported it; but he was opposed to the secret method by which an Order in Council was passed which did not appear in the London Gazette, and about which they knew nothing in the House, until he happened to find out by accident what had been done and asked a Question over a year after the event. This secrecy was very detrimental to the House's control over the proceedings of the Board of Admiralty. The method of secrecy was being extended, for naval men were giving less and less information. During 1905 there was a scare about the guns, and they were therefore interested in getting all the information they could about guns from the Government in 1906. The Admiralty had replied by removing all information about the guns ordered from the Estimates of 1906. Then the question of training was raised last year, and they wanted all information in the Estimates as to how the nucleus crews were distributed and trained. In 1907, on opening the Estimates, he found that this information was removed, and he believed that the Admiralty had only done that because of the general belief that the sea training of the Navy was suffering. The official reason given was that it was impossible to give the usual information, as the nucleus crews of the Home Fleet had not been settled when the Estimates were framed. But surely the Secretary to the Admiralty might have given him a more frank assurance in answer to the question which he had put to him that day, that he would have all the information reinserted in next year's Estimates—information of such great value. That policy of secrecy had been condemned by previous First Lords of the Admiralty. It was strongly condemned by the First Lord of the Admiralty in 1902. The policy, as far as he could gather, was to shelve discussion as much as possible in that House and in the country. At the same time another process went on, of giving one-sided information to favoured newspapers. The result had been that in the Royal United Service Institution, the official debating place, there had been no naval discussions at all, except one lecture by a retired officer; no officer on the active list got up there at all. He regretted very much this want of discussion in the United Service Institution. Sir John Colomb, a very able member of the Conservative Party in the last Parliament, once read a paper which led to the formation of the Naval Intelligence Department and the Admiralty at the time did everything they could to stop his doing so. He thought any attempt to suppress discussion was most mischievous. He had two quotations, one from the late Lord Salisbury, and the other from a Cabinet Minister of that time. Lord Salisbury said—

> "The defence of the country is not the business of the War Office or the Government, but the business of the people themselves."

The Cabinet Minister said—speaking at a dinner in 1902—

> "If the Government had made mistakes it was largely because the people of the country had failed to impress on Governments what they ought to do."

He submitted that it was absolutely impossible for the people to exercise any control over Imperial defence unless the fullest possible information was given; they could not criticise mistakes when they lacked full information. He believed that secrecy was only used to conceal the poverty of the defence. He remembered the story told by the present First Sea Lord, Sir John Fisher, when Admiral superintendent at Portsmouth. He took the French Naval officers round the dockyard on the occasion of their visit. There was an empty store, and when the superintendent came to it, after having shown the party the places of interest, he pointed to the locked door, and the sentry stationed near, and said to the French Admiral, Admiral Gervais—

> "I have shown you everything, but I have the most imperative orders not to show you what is going on in that store."

That illustrated the value of secrecy; it was an empty store. But he was afraid that the policy of empty stores was one which had been liberally applied for some years past. They had never had a thorough investigation, for instance, of the personnel of the Navy, or of what Lord Selborne called the far-reaching reforms which he carried out in 1902, and which had since been developed. There had been various methods of justifying the changes, and they had been asked by Lord Tweedmouth to wait seven or eight years to see the result of the experiments which were being carried out. Personally he was not prepared to wait for eight years if the changes were bad changes. If the changes were good changes he thought the Government could very well grant the prayer of the 225 Members who had asked for an inquiry into the whole of those changes, without any executive authority asked for, but simply that the House might be informed as to whether the changes were good or bad. In reference to the scheme of changes effected in 1905 by Lord Cawdor, they were told for a long time that the Douglas Committee were making a very full inquiry and a very full Report. It turned out to be practically a Departmental Committee, and the Report was first of all refused to them by the Secretary of the Admiralty, but subsequently granted in the House of Lords in response to an appeal by Lord Goschen, who pointed out that the Report had been quoted in official documents. That Committee lasted exactly six weeks. Its inquiry was supposed to be in regard to this great revolution in the training and distribution of officers of the whole Navy. It sat once a week, and it devoted two days to the engineers, one day to the marines, and one day to an artificer and a stoker. This artificer was hostile, and the stoker said that he would like to see the position of the stokers improved. It was a very perfunctory inquiry. The one day devoted to the marines elicited the fact that all the marine witnesses thought that under this scheme they were to be abolished. The inquiry was really a bogus inquiry altogether, and the fact that they were refused this Report, and that it was a bogus inquiry, he thought justified their demand for a very full inquiry into these changes. He should add that the evidence submitted to the Committee was very conflicting, and that there was a minority Report of which they had never heard, this condemnation of the scheme being signed by the representative of the Royal Marines. It was very unfortunate, as showing the atmosphere of suspicion which existed. An officer who signed that minority Report, after being a few months at his billet in the Intelligence Department, a post which he ought to have held three years, was sent to a cruiser on the China station, immediately after signing that Report. That created a bad effect. That was in 1905. He did not say that it was done as a punishment, but he could not ignore the belief of the service that the officer had dared to express an opinion differing from the opinion of those in authority who had formed that Committee, and therefore he was sent out by the Admiralty to the China station. He was by no means contending that many useful reforms had not been carried out by the Board of Admiralty. The introduction of the French nucleus crew system was decidedly good, but it was being carried too far when nucleus crews were put in charge of practically new ships; they were never full crews, but partly-manned crews which were called nucleus crews. The nucleus crews system was creating a great deal of discontent. They had officers devoting themselves for six or seven months to the training of men, and it was heart-breaking at the end of that time to see those men sent away to another ship. Not long ago he asked how many captains and crews the "Barfleur" had had, and he was informed that she had had six captains and five crews during a period of two years. Would any business man change the manager of his works six times and his staff five times in two years and call it good business? It was very bad business, and it was creating a good deal of discontent in the Navy. There was no doubt that the reason so many men were deserting from the Navy was that they objected to being shifted about so much; they did not get a chance of knowing their officers. He thought the improvement in the gunnery was very much to the credit of the Admiralty. It was only fair that if they blamed the Admiralty when things went wrong and harm was done they should praise them when good work was done. He had been told that this was due to the zeal of the sea officer and improvements in the telescope. One of the service papers which acted as a sort of semi-official organ for the Government, the Naval and Military Record, stated that with the new telescope, which possessed 23 magnifying power, they could see the dimple on a fair girl's cheek 2,000 yards away. The Board system, as it existed, had received very high praise from the Esher Committee. The essence of the Board system was that the Prime Minister chose a broad-minded and capable administrator who could estimate the value of evidence and choose good advisers, and under those circumstances the Board had always worked well. If on the other hand they chose a First Lord who was a fool and did away with equality in regard to the advisers, that was the way to wreck the Board. Many evils had resulted from the fact that the equality of the Naval advisers had been done away with by the Order in Council issued under Lord Selborne in regard to the distribution of business on October 20th, 1904. There had been one necessary change by which the First Sea Lord for the first time, through the Committee of Defence, had access to other Cabinet Ministers besides the First Lord of the Admiralty. This extra power should, however, have made Lord Selborne more careful not to extend further the primacy of the First Sea Lord. Instead of this course being taken the First Sea Lord had been made Chairman of the Designs Committee and the Dockyards Committee, giving power over the matériel of the Navy such as Moltke never possessed over the equipment of the German Army; and Chairman of the Estimates Committee. Lord Selborne had also introduced this distribution of business by which all the other Sea Lords and the Civil Lords were ordered to submit any important changes to the First Sea Lord, who had the power of deciding whether those important changes should come before the Board. That change was carried out when Parliament was not sitting. He had detected a tendency to carry out changes at a time of the year when Parliament was not sitting. He thought the tendency of the First Lord's being in the House of Lords was to make the representatives of the Admiralty in the House of Commons quite irresponsible. For instance, the Secretary to the Admiralty on 24th May last year had expressed himself as decidedly hostile to the early entry of officers, whereas early entry lay at the root of all the changes in naval training to which he objected, and if it were abolished then all Lord Selborne's and Lord Cawdor's changes in naval training would go with it. If a First Lord was in the House of Commons and had made that criticism he would have immediately been called upon to justify his views. If he were in that House he would have to stand the whole racket of debate, of answering Questions and Motions, and defending the Estimates, and then Members could find out whether he was a capable administrator or not. Again, they could not in the least bring to book the First Lord's statements in another place. By way of illustration he referred to the statement of the First Lord that the nucleus crews had diminished the number of ships out of repair in the most extraordinary manner, a statement which the First Lord based on a comparison between January 1904 and 1907, which left out material factors so as not to spoil the percentage of 1907. He would take that statement as a test case. The statement had gone forth in the First Lord's speech in the other place and also in the explanatory statement of the Navy Estimates, that in the third week of January, 1904, out of sixty battleships, thirty-eight were unavailable owing to the need of repairs, or 63 per cent. of the whole, and that on the 21st of January, 1907, out of fifty-one battleships only eight, or 16 per cent., were unavailable. Let the House mark the words "unavailable owing to the need of repair." After that Lord Tweedmouth said—

Hon. Members would know the difference between ships needing repair and taking those repairs in hand. Complaint had been made that the Admiralty were not taking the repairs in hand to the extent they were leading them to believe. The "Goliath" was put down for £48,000 and the "Canopus" for £25,000, and neither of those ships figured in the eight ships which the First Lord of the Admiralty included as needing repair. He had been furnished through the kindness of the First Lord with a list of the thirty-eight battleships needing repair in 1904, and he found amongst them the "Monarch" which was simply a depot ship being used to house the crews of ships. Amongst others he also found the "Rupert," which never in her history had been a battleship. No officer of the Admiralty could possibly have made the mistake of putting the "Rupert" in the list of battleships needing repair, and it looked very much like hoaxing the public. It had been acknowledged that ten ships in 1907 were utterly out of repair, and yet they were included in the list of first-class battleships in order to swell the strength statistics. In the First Lord's list of ships needing repair they were, however, excluded as they would spoil the percentage.

In 1904 there was a very extensive policy of reconstruction in progress by which ten battleships and fifteen cruisers were being reconstructed. All those ships which were being reconstructed in 1904 were included in the First Lord's list as needing repair, whereas no ships were being reconstructed now. It was one of the complaints against the Admiralty that whilst rival Powers were reconstructing the Admiralty were doing nothing in the way of reconstruction, because it made no show and enabled them to use obsolete ships to swell the statistics. Another instance of a misleading statement was the First Lord's reference in another place to the mobilisation of the ships on 14th June last year and the wonderful rapidity with which it was carried out. The First Lord insisted that it was a surprise mobilisation, whereas if he had consulted The Times he would have seen that the mobilisation was fully anticipated. Lord Tweedmouth, in the same speech, said—

> "These ships responded to the test put upon them. There was no necessity for a proclamation to call out the Reserves or anything of that sort. They went to sea with full crews with the extreme rapidity I have indicated."

If Lord Tweedmouth would consult The Times he would find: (1) that on 7th June, seven days before, the Admiralty issued the appointments of officers; (2) that on 9th June the arrival of reserve men at the ports took place; (3) that on June 12th a complete official list of vessels for the manœuvres appeared in The Times, and also the order that all leave in the ships was to be stopped, and all offices concerned with mobilisation to be kept open day and night; (4) that on 13th June The Times contained the intimation that the reserve squadron would be mobilised the following day. The Times added—

> "The numbers required to bring the vessels up to war strength are held in readiness at the naval bararcks, with steam-boats in attendance to embark immediately the order to mobilise comes to hand."

Such manœuvres might be called Zanzig manœuvres, because every officer knew that they were coming off. There was another hoax which had been played off on the House, namely, the distribution hoax. They had been told that the new distribution was going to increase the fighting efficiency of the Fleet. If that statement had not been made it would not have been necessary to attack it. The statement was most misleading. Lord Cawdor's Memorandum of November, 1905, stated that there were seventeen battleships in the Channel Fleet. Lord Tweedmouth had met the increase in the German Fleet by reducing the number of battleships in the Channel Fleet to fourteen. It had for some days been cruising with only eleven battleships. Lord Cawdor's Memorandum stated that there were thirty-three battleships in full commission in 1905. The number had now been reduced to thirty-two. In 1905 they were distributed over three Fleets, whereas now they were distributed over four Fleets, and he had yet to learn from any historical teaching that dispersion was better than concentration. Of the thirty-two battle ships in full commission, six were only nominally under the new arrangement of the Nore Division, having only two-fifths of their complements, who were to be assisted by boys, youths, and second-class stokers. To say that such methods increased the fighting efficiency of the Fleet was most misleading. The only real increase in efficiency which he had been able to trace had been in the torpedo flotillas. They were undoubtedly increased. He deprecated the concentration by which so many men were employed on torpedo craft, which, as experience had shown, was only secondary work in actual warfare. He would like to see the concentration work devoted to battleships and cruisers rather than to destroyers. On the question of shipbuilding he was not going to deal with matters which could be discussed on the Estimates, but he protested against the enormous fluctuations which occurred in the shipbuilding programmes of this country. The House hardly realised how enormous these fluctuations were. In the Estimates of 1899 they laid down fourteen armoured vessels, while this year the number was three. In the two years 1889 and 1890 thirty-six protected cruisers were laid down, while for the years 1905 and 1906 there were none. In the three years 1894 to 1896 seventy-nine destroyers were laid down, and for the three years 1905 to 1907 the number was eleven. These enormous fluctuations from abnormal programmes to programmes which were very small were very detrimental to the country, and very bad for all the shipbuilding interests. There were similar variations of policy in regard to the types of ships. One year they built enormous cruisers, and in another year very small cruisers. He was told that Lewis Carroll used to compose his humorous books by writing sentences on little strips of paper, then putting all the bits of paper into a hat, shaking them up, and letting the sentences run on just as they chanced to come out. The Admiralty might just as well make up their ship-building programme that way—put a number of types into the First Lord's bowler, and let the Secretary to the Admiralty take out the first that came. In that way they might arrive at a programme like the present year's—three battleships, one scout, five destroyers. There had been too little consistent policy, too much experimenting in the Navy. He begged to move.

*MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton) said it was with very considerable hesitation that he accepted the invitation of his hon. and gallant friend to second this Motion. It might easily be supposed that he did not possess any of that expert and strategical knowledge which alone could qualify any Member of the House to take part in debates on this particular subject with authority, and the reasons which had induced him to accede to the request made to him were the reflection in the first place that all Members of the House, and indeed the whole community, were under obligation to the hon. Member for the time and industry which he had devoted to naval questions; and in the second place, he was influenced by the consideration that if, after all, the question of naval policy was to be left entirely to the discussion of experts who claimed to have particular knowledge, the number of those who could take part in a debate must be strictly limited. It would be admitted that those who were not experts were under obligation to form the best judgment they could on the extremely important question involved in Motions such as that before the House, and there was no more obvious method of resolving doubts than that of asking the Secretary to the Admiralty, when occasions for doing so were presented, questions such as made it difficult for the hon. Gentleman to avoid giving an answer. He ventured to think that very few of the questions which had been addressed to the Secretary to the Admiralty in the last few months would have been necessary, and that the greater part of the debates on the Navy would have been avoided, if it had not been for certain extremely ambiguous references to the maintenance of the two-Power standard made by the Prime Minister last year, and also the Secretary to the Admiralty during the present session. Every unprejudiced observer would agree that, whether or not at a given moment there had been apprehension that the two-Power standard was being deviated from, persons of all political views had until this Parliament held that the two-Power standard should be maintained as the criterion of our naval strength. The Prime Minister was the first to give rise to serious doubt as to the view which the Government entertained on the two-Power standard, when in July last year he said—

> "When you talk of the two-Power standard after all you cannot keep out of your mind what the two Powers are. I do not object to the two-Power standard as a rough guide, but this is a two-Power standard of almost a preposterous kind."

The definition of the two-Power standard admittedly was not dependent on any strictly logical principle, and among the different definitions which had been offered, the one which had held the field premised that there should be no inquiry as to what the two Powers were. The Secretary to the Admiralty speaking on 5th March said—

> "Originally the two-Power standard meant two specified European Powers. It was not a standard in the abstract, but at best it was only a rule of thumb—a rough and ready test. There might be conceivable circumstances in which the two-Power standard was too much, and imaginable circumstances in which too little."

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON explained that what he had said was that while under certain circumstances a two-Power standard might be too much, there were conceivable circumstances in which a three-Power standard wou'd be too little.

MR. F. E. SMITH said he meant to say that, and he entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman. Did or did not the right hon. Gentleman adhere to the statement of the Prime Minister that they should not keep out of their mind what the two Powers were? Even last month the Prime Minister used this expression—

> "Supposing we were at any time to be in close alliance with the two Powers with the largest navies, however close that alliance may be, should we rigidly adhere to the two-Power standard?"

He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell the House explicitly whether it was the view of the Government that the two-Power standard might vary according to the view the Government formed at a given moment in regard to our alliances with other Powers? The preamble of the German Navy Bill might possibly supply some assistance in answering the question what a two-Power standard ought to be. The words were—

> "Germany must have a fleet of such strength that a war even against the mightiest naval Power would involve risks threatening the supremacy of that Power."

The debate was a strictly non-Party one, and he did not desire to make any attack on the Government. But he would remind the Secretary to the Admiralty that in 1904–5 the expenditure on the Fleet was £42,000,000, while in 1906–7 it was £36,000,000, or a reduction of £6,000,000. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Hear, hear."] He did not in the least quarrel with the cheers with which those figures were received. He was rather disposed to think that the temporary paralysis of shipbuilding abroad, which had been occasioned by the building of the "Dreadnought" might be sufficient justification for that reduction. Yet it should be remembered that in 1904–5, when the expenditure of the Navy was higher than in any single year of our history, the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said at a meeting of the Eighty Club—

> "I want to see the British Navy still stronger than it is, a fighting instrument always ready to strike, for then, it is almost certain, it will not be called upon to strike."

He had listened with interest to the explanation of the Secretary to the Admiralty as to the relative strength of the great maritime Powers to-day. At first sight it appeared that his explanation was a complete and persuasive one; but there were one or two points, not clear to his mind, on which some further information might be given. It was stated that if they took battleships less than eighteen years old, Great Britain had fifty-two as compared with forty-nine possessed by France and Germany. Great Britain had thirty-seven battleships less than thirteen years old, and France and Germany had forty-one. Great Britain had nineteen battleships less than eight years old, as contrasted with twenty-eight possessed by France and Germany. He asked the Secretary to the Admiralty what difference in the judgment of his advisers the comparative age of our battleships and those of France and Germany made in estimating the relative strength. As he understood, at the present time the total number of battleships in our Navy was sixty-three, if those built, building, and projected were counted. Of these, forty-seven were unarmoured over the portion of the water-line, while in the Fleets of France and Germany, none of the battleships were unarmoured over the water-line. What deductions did expert opinion allow under this head in the consideration of relative strength? Of our sixty-three battleships, he understood that two were building, that nine were admittedly obsolete, thirteen were to have no more repairs bestowed upon them, and six were at the present time under repair. That left thirty-three battleships in full commission. The statement was very frequently made, when a comparison was drawn between the battleships of this country and France and Germany, that we built, or had facilities for building, vessels better than any other country in the world. He wished to know whether that statement was accurate in the opinion of those who to-day advised the Admiralty? The Cawdor Memorandum laid it down that every ship ought to be completed in twenty-four months, yet the "Minotaur" and "Defence" would take three years and two months. Why was the time so greatly exceeded in these instances in relation to the time mentioned in the Cawdor Memorandum? Was there any similar instance in Germany? He did not propose to ask any questions as to the strategical distribution of the Fleet, but he would put one or two in regard to the non-strategical distribution of the Fleet. He understood that when the late Government left office, there were thirty-two battleships always at sea, and fourteen battleships in reserve with nucleus crews, or forty-six in all. At present, there were six battleships in the Mediterranean instead of eight as before; in the Channel fourteen, instead of sixteen; and in the Atlantic, six instead of eight. In the result, there were at present only twenty-six sea-going battleships, instead of thirty-two. If however, the hon. Gentleman said that the Nore Fleet was a fully sea-going Fleet, then as against fourteen vessels in reserve at that date there were only seven in reserve now. In the words of Admiral Sir W. May—

> "What the sailor needs is the sea, the sea and manœuvres at whatever cost, and they are very expensive. But it is useless to have a Navy unless we are prepared to pay all the expenses of training at sea."

In 1904 the right hon. Member for Dundee stated that the Admiralty formed the view that the strength of the sea-going Fleet was greater than strategy demanded, but his hon. friend the Member for Fareham, who had considerable opportunity of ascertaining what was the opinion of the Admiralty at that time, denied that and said that he had never heard at the Admiralty the opinion that the strength of the sea-going Fleet was too great. He wanted to know if there was any truth in statements which had been made that to some extent at least the complements of the Fleet at the Nore were made up of boys, and that the ships were going to be used as training colleges? If the change was dictated by economy, what was the economy likely to be obtained? He would like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether or not it was the view of the Admiralty that 70 per cent. of sea-going time of the men at the Nore would make them effective? An extremely interesting discussion had been raised by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean, as to the policy of the Government in regard to cruisers. The right hon. Gentleman said it was ancient history now to build cruisers, as far as the protection and destroying of commerce were concerned and that we could hold our hands in that respect. The right hon. Gentleman said the whole policy of naval experts had been revolutionised as far as the building of cruisers was concerned. He would like to know if that view was shared by the Government, and whether the Secretary to the Admiralty had reason to believe it was shared by foreign Powers.

SIR CHARLES DILKE said that he founded his statement entirely upon the action of foreign Powers and on the estimates of foreign Powers.

*MR. F. E. SMITH was obliged to the right hon. Baronet and had no doubt the Secretary to the Admiralty would tell him whether he was right in gathering from the German naval estimates that that Power intended to build two new fast cruisers annually. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would say whether that view was correct or whether the view the right hon. Baronet had brought forward was well founded. But there was a more important consideration in reference to this question of building cruisers, as to which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Admiralty might be able to give some information to the House, and that was the proposals which the Government were likely to lay before The Hague Conference, or rather what was the position which the representatives of this country were likely to take at that Conference in regard to the proposal to forbid the capture of private property at sea. He asked what the position of our representatives would be and what effect the proposal would have, if adopted, upon the shipbuilding programme of the future. It was an extremely important question whether it was the intention of the Government to support that proposal. In conclusion there was one further branch of his hon. friend's Resolution upon which he wished to make a few observations. It was that part in which he complained of the methods of secrecy which had been adopted by the Admiralty. He did not think his hon. friend limited that complaint to the present Government or to the last twelve months or was desirous of treating the question as a Party one, nor did he wish to treat it as such, but he would recall the words of Mr. W. H. Smith who, he believed, was formerly a very capable and clear-sighted First Lord of the Admiralty. Mr. Smith said—

"There was nothing in the objection that inquiry would give information to foreign Powers. For those who had the management of their navies knew a great deal more about our Navy than many of us did. The Government might suppress printed documents, but if he wanted information on the Navy he could get it at Berlin, Copenhagen or Paris if he chose to pay. The only effect of withholding information from England was to create the impression that it could not be given without damage to responsible officials."

The observation was profoundly true, and he therefore urged upon the right hon. Gentleman that he should be more communicative to hon. Members in all parts of the House. On 18th July 1906, the hon. Member for King's Lynn asked the Secretary to the Admiralty—

"What reserve of heavy guns was maintained by the German navy for battleships carrying four heavy guns each; and whether the guns in German fortifications generally corresponded to the guns on board the ships."

The Secretary to the Admiralty replied—

"So many questions have recently been addressed to me on the subject of foreign navy estimates, programmes and policy that I am constrained to ask my hon. friend and other hon. Members to excuse me from making statements on subjects as to which the Board of Admiralty have no official knowledge and can take no responsibility."

He would have thought, in the first place, that the Board of Admiralty ought to have official knowledge, and he was glad to call to his aid as a formidable ally in this contention the right hon. Gentleman himself, who when in opposition delivered a telling indictment of the Admiralty because they were not able to give him information as to the Russian Admiralty's policy. To take another Question which had been asked, and, in his judgment, had not been sufficiently answered, on 19th February, 1907, the hon. Member for Ludlow asked the Secretary to the Admiralty—

"If he has received any official report from Admiral Lord Charles Beresford as to the sufficiency of the Channel Fleet; and, if so, whether he proposes to take any action in consequence of the report."

The Secretary to the Admiralty replied—

"The Admiralty must, in the interest of the public service, decline to allow their confidential communications with the officers of the Fleet to be the subject of Parliamentary inquiry."

He quite assented to that in so far as the declaration in reference to Parliamentary inquiry was concerned, but he thought it could hardly have been very injurious either to admit or to deny the receipt of a report. Again, on 21st February 1907, the hon. Member for King's Lynn asked—

"How many skilled and how many unskilled ratings are embraced in the two-fifths complement of nucleus crews, and how many will there be in the new skeleton crews; and how many battleships and cruisers which, on 1st March 1906, were fully manned or partially manned, will, under the new scheme of distribution, be degraded to ships with skeleton crews."

In answer the Secretary to the Admiralty said—

"It has been the practice of the Admiralty to treat details of complement as strictly confidential, and I regret, therefore, that I cannot give my hon. friend the information asked for."

To be perfectly candid with the House, after he had read the Answer about Lord Charles Beresford he came to the conclusion that that was an instance in which the Secretary was justified, but what he complained of was that while information was refused to the House it was given to the Press to whom inspired communications were made. There was another Question to which, and the Answer to it, he would call attention. On 17th July 1906, the hon. Member for King's Lynn asked the Secretary to the Admiralty—

"Whether he can give an approximate estimate of the relative cost of eight battleships in full commission, such as the Atlantic Fleet, and eight battleships with nucleus crews on board ready for mobilisation, under the system established by Lord Selborne's Memorandum, 6th December, 1904."

The Secretary to the Admiralty replied—

"The Board of Admiralty are of opinion that it is not in the interests of the public service to give the information for which the hon. Member asks."

There was no question of strategy there, and it was eminently one for men of business in this House to consider, yet they were told that the information could not be given. Another Question, asked on 21st December, 1906, by the hon. Member for King's Lynn of the Secretary to the Admiralty, was—

"How many armoured cruisers during the present year have been in collision; how many have grounded with or without injury; and how many have been put out of commission in order to enable engine-room or gun defects to be taken in hand."

The Secretary to the Admiralty replied—

> "It does not appear to be in the public interest that the information asked for by the hon. Member should be published."

In his opinion it had aways been in the interests of the Navy that any errors or alleged errors of seamanship should be ventilated in the House, but on this occasion the information necessary for them to form a judgment upon the matter had been refused. On Wednesday, 27th March, 1907, the hon. Member for King's Lynn asked the Secretary to the Admiralty—

> "How many signatures are required to make an order of the Admiralty executive in reference to the removal of an officer in command of his fleet, ship or barracks, or whether this power can be exercised by the First Lord of the Admiralty without the concurrence of the Sea Lords forming the Board of Admiralty; and whether he can state in what respects the practice is a variation, and under what Patent or Order in Council, from that pursued in April, 1795, when the decision of Lord Spencer to supersede Admiral Lord Hood in the command of the Mediterranean Fleet could not be carried into effect until he obtained the signature of two of the Sea Lords."

The Secretary to the Admiralty replied—

> "The Board of Admiralty are not prepared to discuss their present methods of administration of Admiralty business, and the methods practised by their predecessors in 1795. The hon. Member may rest assured that provisions contained in the Letters Patent under which the Lords Commissioners exercise their authority are duly observed."

He could not see why that Question should not have been answered. The utmost importance was attached by the Select Committee of 1861 to the question of signatures in order to prevent an individual acting for the whole Board in any important matter that was not of the most urgent character. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would have been well advised to answer it with the greatest frankness. What made the matter more galling and annoying was that, as he had indicated, side by side with deliberate and repeated refusals to give information in the House, there had grown a system under which inspired communications had been made not only to the Press but to persons organising agitation. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury, asked for an explanation of the increase in the Vote for Naval literature from £73,299 in 1901–2 to £117,774 in 1904–5, said it was due to the expansion of the "intelligence publications." No one who had read the publications of the Admiralty during the last four or five years would be in any real doubt as to what was meant by the "intelligence publications" which had been expanded. It was common knowledge amongst those who had been reading these publications that there was a most deplorable change of tone in them some four or five years ago—that they were now marked by great levity, and that documents had been circulated at the public charge which had no claim to be paid for by the nation. These documents, some of which had come into his hands, were marked "Private and confidential." No one had a right to mark documents "Private and confidential" and then send them to the Press in the hope that, by so marking them, one might be discouraged in that House or elsewhere from discussing their contents. In one of these publications a deliberate request had been made that outside agitation should be conducted. It was written—

> "The Board of Admiralty would welcome outside pressure to enable them to nominate to Keyham as you suggest; but the outcry would be tremendous. We should be glad of the support of the engineering associations of the country, as doubtless we shall have to face much hostility, but we do not fear anyone. Do right and damn the odds."

In a letter on this subject obligingly supplied in an official memorandum an illustrious person wrote—

> "The Frenchman's Fleet appears now by the Gods, > We'll fight them as of old, and damn the odds."

Of course distinguished persons might be guilty of levity, but their utterances of that character ought not to be printed and sent round at the public expense. The result of these publications had been that for the last four years Press cuttings had been printed and published by the Admiralty which should never have been printed and published by a Department of the State. There had recently appeared an extremely controversial pamphlet called

"The Truth About the Navy;" and of this the Admiralty had bought a great number of copies at the public expense and distributed them through every vessel in the Fleets. The Admiral of the Mediterranean Fleet, in response to the representations of his captains, refused to circulate the pamphlet on the ground that such publication was not in the interests of the service. As to the "Dreadnought," when he asked for certain information it was refused in the public interest. But very shortly afterwards a document was circulated to the Press, "not for official publication, but to serve as a guide to members of the Press, and not to be quoted verbatim." This document contained the very information which he had desired to obtain, information much in advance of any that had been published. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would persuade the Admiralty neither to allow their controversial methods to degenerate into a species of gasconade, nor to continue their gratuitous contributions to an economical Press.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, while recognising the services rendered by the Admiralty, regrets to observe evidence of ill-considered changes vitally affecting the war readiness of the Navy; the House is of opinion that its control over the Navy in recent years has been, and is being, weakened by the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty from the House of Commons, by undue secrecy, by sudden changes of policy, and by Admiralty officials resorting to novel methods for the purpose of influencing public opinion."—(Mr. Bellairs.)

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee) admitted that this was an embarrassing Motion, for it was moved by a supporter of the Government, and seconded by one of their determined opponents. It was at once a Motion of confidence and a Motion of censure, and he accepted it for what it was worth. The second dubious characteristic attaching to the Motion was that it was an attack on two Administrations. Personally he was only responsible for one Administration. The Leader of the Opposition had laid down the sound proposition that the responsibility for acts done by officials rested not on them, but on the Government of the day; and, though the Government and the Admiralty were responsible for all that the officials did in their departments, they could not accept responsibility for what had been done by their predecessors. There were four charges contained in the Motion. The main charges made were to be found in the second part of the resolution. The question of the House of Commons' control over the Navy and the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty from a place in the House was one really for the Prime Minister; but he might point out that the present First Lord of the Admiralty and his two immediate predecessors had enjoyed long experience in the House of Commons, and knew the House of Commons point of view as well as any Member sitting in it. In the last twenty-five years out of nine First Lords six had been Members of the House of Lords and three Members of the House of Commons; but really this particular point might be more properly raised on Vote 12 of the Estimates. The second charge made was one of undue secrecy, amounting to a want of veracity on the part of the Admiralty and its representatives. The hon. Member for King's Lynn had been permitted to say in the columns of the Spectator that "we do not get the truth; we seldom do in regard to Naval matters," and at the United Service Institution the hon. Member permitted himself to use language calling in question the good faith of the Admiralty. His hon. friend was the last man in the world who ought to complain of want of information or of attempts at secrecy. In the short time his hon. friend had been a Member of the House the amount of information that he had extracted from the Admiralty was incredible. In the one year and a quarter he had been in office the hon. Member for King's Lynn had asked 196 Questions altogether. As the representative of the Admiralty, he was, of course, dependent upon official assistance. He instructed those who assisted him to give to every specific Question a specific Answer, without evasion, without argument, and in the fewest possible words. He appealed to the House whether the whole tenor of his replies had not been consistent in that respect. He could only charge himself, on looking back on the Questions which had been asked, with three important categories in which secrecy had been maintained. The first was as to the reserve of guns. He had refused altogether to give information about that, and he still adhered to that resolution. In the opinion of the Admiralty it was not desirable that our reserve of guns should be made known to the whole world. The necessity for that secrecy had increased since the Russo-Japanese war. Other nations also observed secrecy in this matter, and if the information was given we should be giving them a benefit which they took care not to give to us. He had also refused to answer certain Questions about foreign navies. They were apt to be invidious Questions. He had answered them as far as he could, but he ought not to be asked to give information about facts of which he had no official knowledge. Nor had he given Answers to Questions relating to the Home Fleet. The Home Fleet was experimental; it was still growing, and to make statements at this early stage as to future developments would only be to tie the hands of the Admiralty. He did not gather from the hon. and learned Member opposite that he complained of secrecy which had been maintained with regard to the "Dreadnought" and "Invincible."

MR. F. E. SMITH: I did complain that at the time information was not given to the House it was given in the Memorandum.

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON said he would only say, that so much did he desire to give the House all the information that could possibly be given that he put in last year's Estimates rather fuller information about both the "Dreadnought" and the "Invincible," and he had not been asked to give more. He had not refused to give more, and he did not say that to give more was impossible, but so far it was rather fuller than had been asked for. He was sure that both hon. Members would accept what he said, when he stated that it was the belief of certain Naval authorities that the secrecy which had been maintained with regard to the "Dreadnought" and the "Invincible" resulted in a postponement of building by foreign Powers, which was a casual benefit to this country. He was not prepared to say more than that.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham) reminded the right hon. Gentleman that when in opposition he had himself complained because this very information was refused to him.

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON said he had asked for details which had been refused to him, but which had been given to Engineering. He had not made that a complaint. All he asked, if he remembered rightly, was whether the details published in the Engineering newspaper were correct. There was one occasion on which he had given the hon. and gallant Gentleman an inaccurate Answer, and he wished to be allowed to explain it away. It was a curious story. In August the hon. and gallant Member put a Question to him as to the number of German ships that were projected for the next two years. It was an unstarred Question, and in the official reply, prepared by an official at the Admiralty, instead of the figure "6," which was the correct figure, the figure "5" was inserted. By a pure clerical error "5" was given instead of "6." The hon. Member for King's Lynn called his attention to it and asked whether it was correct, and he told the hon. Member that it was wrong—that a wrong figure had been inserted by a slip of the pen; it was a pure blunder on the part of one of the subordinates. The hon. Member sent this correspondence to the newspapers, and one of them—he would content himself with calling it a Tory paper—received the explanation with derision and suggested that it was a false explanation. He could not correct the Answer because, as it happened, it was not printed in "Hansard"; and the incident passed out of his mind. To his surprise, four months later, a Question was put to him by a Tory Member, asking him whether he had not made an erroneous statement, why he had made it, and whether he proposed to correct it? On inquiry he found that this accidentally erroneous statement, made in August last year, which at the time was not printed by the official reporter at all, had actually made its appearance as an official Answer three months afterwards. He asked the official reporter how that had come about without any consultation with him. The reply of the official reporter was that he had been asked to print it by the hon. Member for King's Lynn; and the hon.

Member took that step, knowing that by a clerical slip the Answer was erroneous, and without giving him the opportunity of correcting it.

MR. BELLAIRS: May I explain?

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I decline to give way. I did not interrupt the hon. Member.

MR. BELLAIRS: Mr. Speaker, have I not the right to reply?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will have the opportunity of making a personal explanation.

*MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON said that disposed of the charge of undue secrecy. Then he came to the other head of indictment—about the changes. It was said that changes had been made vitally affecting the readiness of the Navy for war. But no allegation had been made that the present Government had introduced any changes at all, good or bad, except in the case of the Home Fleet, which had already been discussed. Reference had been made to changes in the training of officers and men. As to these changes, the present Government continued the system they found in operation, or about to come into operation, as devised by their predecessors in office. They were not absolutely committed to these changes, but they determined to give them a full and fair trial and were watching and waiting as to the result. He was bound to say, speaking for himself, that in connection with Naval matters he was a good deal conservative. His own belief was that, after the very serious and important changes which had taken place, what the Navy wanted now was a period of rest and reflection during which the experiments might be left to work out their own development. He came to the last head of the indictment on which the hon. and learned Gentleman who seconded the Motion had spoken in a tone to which, seriously and frankly, he took no exception whatever. The greater part of his speech was a discussion of Vote 8, but he preferred to stick to the text of the Motion, and defer answering all those questions. He preferred to confine himself to the very important observations which the hon. and learned Member made, as he supposed, in justification of the last head of the indictment, as to the novel methods pursued by officials of the Admiralty in order to influence public opinion. Some of the statements made about these methods came to him for the first time. As to the document marked "private and confidential" he had never heard of it; and with regard to the pamphlet, "The Truth About the Navy," he was sure the hon. and learned Gentleman would accept his statement when he said that he had never read a line of it. He preferred to get his information officially. He did not know what the contents of the document were, but all he knew about it was that he had been told inside the office that, on the whole, with one exception, it was a fairly accurate account of what had taken place. He was asked if it was written by an Admiralty official, and had given the answer "No," and he did that upon information volunteered to him by a gentleman, who was certainly not an official, that he was the author. "The Truth About the Navy" was circulated to a certain extent among the Fleet by order of the Admiralty at a cost of £25. He might say also that their action in this matter had not been all on one side, because he found to his astonishment and disgust that the money for which he was responsible had been expended upon similar publications and that a publication in quite a different direction, "The Naval Annual," containing a long article attacking the policy of the Government by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the motion, was circulated at a cost of £127. There was also the Royal Naval List, which contained, not only an attack on the Admiralty, but a partisan attack on the Government of the day, and that was circulated at a cost of £11 18s. Again the United Service Institute—or Institution—had afforded a platform for attacks against the Admiralty, and that body was subsidised by the Admiralty to the extent of £375 a year. Looking at the matter seriously, he really thought it would be better to ignore all such publications and all journalistic writings, whether in attack or defence of the Admiralty. One other matter he wished to refer to in reference to the Motion, and he called the attention of the House to the terms. First, "ill-considered changes" were condemned, and this must refer to the action of the late Government, for the present Government had made none; but the allegation he wished to come to close quarters with was that these changes—ill-considered or sudden they might be, he would say nothing about that—had impaired the readiness for war of his Majesty's Navy. That was the imputation, and if that was not its meaning he did not know what meaning it could have. That was a grave statement to make, but did the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite concur in the statement, the more serious as coming from an hon. Gentleman who had been connected with the service? If he intended to say that, it was a most dangerous statement to make. He believed he was justified in saying that never in the history of the British Navy had it been so ready for war as it was at the present moment. Some allusion had been made to the question of repairs. On that point he might be permitted to say that the Admiralty increased the provision for repairs last year to the extent of more than a quarter of a million—£266,000—beyond the sum originally provided for by the Estimates, and they had increased the provision this year to the extent of £200,000 over last year. That provision was considered by the naval advisers of the Admiralty to be ample. Then as to the two-Power standard, let him say —he believed it had been already stated elsewhere by his noble friend the First Lord of the Admiralty—that it was the determination of the Government to maintain our Naval supremacy as it stood now, and, in the event of The Hague Conference proving abortive, to hold themselves ready to take steps to maintain our relative position. That was all he would say on that point, and, in conclusion, he thanked the House for the hearing they had given him, and invited them to reject the Motion.

MR. BELLAIRS in making a personal explanation, said he thought that every Member of the House who asked a Question and got an Answer had the right to have the Question and Answer printed in The Parliamentary Debates. Finding his Question was not printed, he went to to the official reporter, who consented to print it. He told the official reporter at the same time that the Answer was erroneous, and that it ought to be six battleships instead of five. He asked him whether he should make the correction, and he said no, as he had no right to edit the right hon. Gentleman's replies.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham) thought that this Motion amounted to a vote of censure on the Board of Admiralty, and would, if carried, lead to their resignation. He wanted to give the reasons why he found himself unable to support the Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman had said it would be the height of presumption for him to attempt to defend the late Board of Admiralty, but he hoped it would not be considered presuming on his part if he attempted to deal with the question of the continuity of policy of the two Boards, and gave that as his chief reason for not committing himself to the support of this Motion. He hoped, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would realise that dissent from this Motion did not commit him and his friends in any way to a general support of the policy of the Admiralty or preclude them from embarking on serious criticism of Admiralty administration on many points of detail when the proper occasion arose. But if they had grave doubts on certain recent developments of naval administration, he thought the attack should not be directed so much against the Board of Admiralty as against the Government itself, and particularly against the Prime Minister, for tampering with the shipbuilding programme in a fit of sentimentality and in the desire to assist The Hague Conference. He thought they had plenty of justification for attacking the Government along that line, but this sweeping condemnation of the Board of Admiralty was, he thought, not politic, and he would remind some of his hon. friends that the resolution, as a weapon of attack, might prove to have some of the peculiar and inconvenient qualities of the boomerang. What they ought to strive for was continuity of naval policy. They did not mean that kind of continuity which was now favoured by the Secretary of State for War, which consisted apparently in repudiating all the acts of his predecessor and in claiming that continuity of policy should only be prospective, and built only on the foundations which he himself had laid. They meant that the present Board of Admiralty should maintain generally the naval policy initiated by Lord Selborne and developed by Lord Cawdor, and handed on to Lord Tweedmouth. He wished he could say that the Government had lived up to its duty in that respect, quite as much as the right hon. Gentleman had suggested. The Opposition would like to take a non-Party view of this matter, and to give a general support to the Board of Admiralty that evening, but such a course was made very difficult for them by the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman on previous occasions. The Opposition had been denied proper and reasonable Answers to important Questions. They were, however, unwilling to join in a direct vote of censure on the Admiralty. One naturally hesitated to give a verdict in the absence of the full and authoritative information which alone could enable a competent judgment to be formed. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would have been better advised if he had made a clean breast of it in answering the Questions put to him by the Leader of the Opposition in the recent debate. As he was apparently unwilling to do so, an early opportunity would be taken in another place of asking the Government to reply on the points which had been raised. Those inquiries would be made under circumstances which would make it impossible for them to be evaded by the rules of debate. Meanwhile the Opposition were anxious to give the Board of Admiralty the benefit of the doubt. They were willing to assume that, subject to the financial restrictions imposed upon it by the Government, it had endeavoured to carry out in its broad outlines, at any rate, the general policy bequeathed by its predecessors. He did not wish to differentiate between the Civil and Naval members of the Board, for each member must bear the full responsibility for all Admiralty policy. He was sorry that the hon. Member for King's Lynn should have stated that the quality of the Naval advisers of the Admiralty had greatly deteriorated during the last few years.

MR. BELLAIRS said he did not remember making such a statement. What he said was that the First Sea Lord was no longer the first among equals, but was superior to others.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE said he accepted the hon. Gentleman's explanation, but he strongly deprecated the singling out of any Member of the Board for special attack or denunciation as the hon. Member had in the case of the First Sea Lord.

MR. BELLAIRS: I made no attack to-day.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE admitted that the hon. Gentleman had come before them to-day more in the guise of a sucking-dove than of a roaring lion; but he thought that when the hon. Member read on the morrow his remarks he would see that he had singled out the First Sea Lord for attack.

MR. BELLAIRS said he had never singled out the First Sea Lord for consideratian. What he had said was that the First Sea Lord had been conceded too much power.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE said that the impression of the hon. Member's remarks made upon his mind was as he had stated. But he did not think it was necessary for him, or anyone else to take up the cudgels on behalf of the First Sea Lord. He would do that for himself when, and if, his opponents appeared in the open. But that was a digression. What the Resolution invited the House to do was to attack, not an individual, but the Board of Admiralty in its corporate capacity. He had already explained why he personally was not prepared to join in an attack of that nature. He could only say that in the absence of definite and authoritative information he felt bound to refrain from giving a hostile vote and to suspend judgment on the latest developments of Admiralty policy. But, looking at the results as a whole, and mainly owing to the reforms introduced by the late Government, he was certain that the right hon. Gentleman was justified in saying there had been a great advance in the general efficiency of the Navy, and in the readiness of the Fleet for purposes of war. That was the true test after all, and perhaps the best critical summary of the present position of the Admiralty was that made by The Times Correspondent, who had been writing a series of articles during the last few months, wherein he said that the real question was what had been done not how, and that they might overlook some eccentricities of method if, on the whole, the right thing had been done strenuously and faithfully. Some mistakes had no doubt been made, and some steps had been retrieved, but the country would judge the Admiralty not by occasional mistakes, but by solid and substantial achievements. That was friendly, shrewd, and, he thought, reasonable criticism. He wished the hon. Member for Kings Lynn's Motion had been couched in a similar strain, but it contained within it several propositions to which the Opposition could not possibly agree. The hon. Member had also spoken of the demand put forward by 225 members of the House, for an inquiry into the administration of the Board of Admiralty; but if even 670 members had petitioned the Government of the day for such an inquiry, he hoped they would refuse it. [Laughter.] Well, perhaps he had exaggerated the numbers; but he appealed to both sides of the House that it was altogether out of the question that an outside body should inquire into the policy of the Admiralty.

MR. BELLAIRS said that 225 Members had never signed any application for an inquiry into the policy of the Admiralty, but as to certain changes proposed to be made in Naval training.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE said certainly the impression he had stated was held at the Admiralty some time ago. In conclusion he hoped that he had succeeded in making his position, which was a somewhat difficult one, perfectly plain. Although he thought that the Admiralty during the last twelve months had done many things and shown many tendencies which were causing anxiety to friends of the Navy, yet at the same time many who sat on the Opposition side of the House could not support a direct vote of censure of this kind, which in its form he believed to be both inopportune and unwise, because its main effect would be to excite sympathy with the Board of Admiralty, at a time, too, when it was not sympathy they required, but the closest and most vigilant watching.

MR. JENKINS (Chatham) complained that he had received no answer from the Secretary to the Admiralty in reply to a Question on Tuesday in reference to the sale of obsolete ships that had been scrapped. At all times up to this occasion he had found the right hon. Gentleman very courteous in his replies, but in this instance, although he asked a specific question, no reply was given. If the right hon. Gentleman had not the information at his command at the moment, any hon. Member would be only too delighted to put down the Question and submit it again, because they were all aware that the replies to Questions were drawn up by the permanent officials at the Department. He had no desire to criticise the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman except in that respect, and he thought he should have been asked to submit the Question again. Pertinent replies should in his opinion be given to pertinent questions. He put the case of three ships, the tonnage displacement of which he estimated at between thirty and forty thousand tons. He had been informed that scrapped steel was worth £4 per ton. He estimated that these vessels should have realised £174,000, but they were sold for £57,800. That was a loss of £116,000 to the country. He urged that when ships were about to be sold they should be broken up in the Royal dockyards. There was every convenience, and few tools were required for the purpose. That would to some extent prevent the wholly senseless discharges at Woolwich and our other dockyards, which were national institutions, by giving employment to the men. These dockyards furnished the stable industry of the places where they were situated, which in many cases like Woolwich were going to wreck and ruin through these discharges. He did not join with the mover and seconder in their criticisms as to the policy of the Admiralty, because on the various Estimates he would have opportunities of bringing forward any points he had to raise; but he protested that when a Member raised a question over which the nation was losing thousands of pounds, he ought to have a reply and if it could not then be given he should be asked to repeat the Question.

* CAPTAIN HERVEY (Bury St. Edmunds) said it seemed to him that of all the ill-considered changes that might vitally affect the war readiness of the Navy the insane desire of certain hon. Gentlemen opposite to reduce expenditure on the Navy in the interests of economy, without due regard to the interests of efficiency was the worst. He hoped that course of action would not be pursued after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that it was the settled policy of the Board of Admiralty to keep the Navy in the same condition of preponderance in the future that it was now in. If that was the case, he hoped in the future they would hear no more of any reductions in the number of men belonging to the Fleet, because we could not possibly have the same preponderance and the same efficiency that we had now if the number were reduced. He was afraid they would be going back to the bad old days before 1889 if they made further reduction—the days when the Sea Lords of the Admiralty, instead of making their programme on the basis of what was required for the needs of the service, and stating what money was wanted, only gave consideration to the question of how best to use such money as was doled out to them by the Admiralty. What were the changes that had been introduced in the last few years? First, rapid shipbuilding had been introduced. That did not seem to be a very bad change, and if the present Admiralty were responsible in any degree for that change, they were to be congratulated. The building of the "Dreadnought" in so short a time had proved a great success, and he hoped the Admiralty would continue to make that sort of change. The next change was the reorganisation of the Fleet. He disagreed with those who thought it was bad that our main squadrons should be organised in four fleets instead of three, because so long as the four fleets were effective they were stronger for war purposes than three could ever be. And why? The Atlantic Squadron might be regarded as a reinforcing squadron for either the Mediterranean or Home Fleet in case the political situation abroad altered from what it was now. The formation of nucleus crews also was a most useful thing, so long as there were not fewer ships kept in full commission. Hon. Members must not forget that before these nucleus crews were organised, ships in reserve were to a large extent allowed to rot, but now, by putting officers and a certain number of men on board those ships, they stood a better chance of being kept in proper condition. It was for such reasons as these that he could not support this Motion. The elimination of old and small ships on foreign stations was also a good thing. He was aware that it was said that the elimination of these ships gave less chance for training officers, but there were other ships, such as torpedo boats and torpedo boat destroyers, in which young officers could be adequately trained, and in which they could attain a high state of efficiency. He therefore did not believe that it would be satisfactory to continue to build these small ships at great cost, and to keep them in commission on foreign stations. He had had a good deal of experience at the Admiralty, and he was convinced that the system of nucleus crews would tend to keep the ships which were in reserve in good condition and not allow them to rot through want of personal attention as they used to do. They wished to have as many torpedo boats and destroyers in commission as possible, so that the officers might get that sea training which was so essential to them, and which they could hardly get in any other way. The hon. Member had referred to the 225 signatories who wished to approach the Prime Minister with a view to getting the Admiralty to reconsider their decision on the question of naval training. They knew by past experience what had happened in regard to the reconsideration of decisions of that sort. It was within the memory of many of them, he dared say, how a reconsideration was come to over the question of water-tube boilers. The Admiralty were foolish enough to accede to the request of those who asked for an inquiry into that matter. What was the result? The only people who benefited by it were the Committee, who, by the time they had finished, had learned what were the real needs of the service with regard to water-tube boilers. During the time they were sitting they partially humbugged about eighteen of our then newest and best battleships and cruisers, by experimentally putting into them partly ordinary cylindrical boilers and partly water-tube boilers. The Committee was appointed to consider the advisability of the installation of water-tube boilers, and afterwards it was found that there was no necessity for the Committee as everyone was aware now of the efficiency of that class of boiler. He believed himself that the Committee which was asked for now was not necessary. If they would only allow the rules which were being evolved by the present Board of Admiralty with reference to training gradually to develop, if they would allow the Admiralty a reasonably free hand to see a gradual development in the right direction, he believed that the new system of training would be a thorough success. He did not believe that a Committee sitting to examine into the methods of the Admiralty would recommend anything of practical benefit which the Admiralty would not concede on the advice of their experts, and he did not think it desirable that such a Committee should be granted at all.

Mr. BELLAIRS asked leave to withdraw the Motion after the discussion which had taken place. [Cries of "No, no."]

Leave to withdraw being refused,

Question put, and negatived.

HOURS OF LABOUR (BAKEHOUSES) BILL.

Captain Hervey.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) thought that they could not enter upon a consideration of the regulation of the hours of work in bakehouses without time for a full discussion of the subject. If they began to regulate the hours of bakehouses they would also have to consider the price of bread.

Mr. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said he had received representations from his constituents, who pointed out that the Bill introduced regulations for which they did not ask, and which would prevent their commencing their labours before a certain hour in the morning, and compel them to cease at a certain hour at night. The regulations which were proposed would, if carried out, be extremely hard upon men in a small way of trade. It was quite possible that some regulations might be required for big manufactories, but he was only speaking for his constituents in pursuance of his duty, and he submitted that it was not desirable that a Bill affecting a trade, whether in a large or small way, all over the country, should be rushed through the Second Reading stage at the last moment of the sitting, when the matter could not receive that attention which it deserved, though it was one which affected a great many people in all constituencies.

And, it being Eleven of the clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

The PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. George Whiteley, Yorkshire, W.R., Pudsey), in moving the adjournment, gave notice that to-morrow he would move the suspension of the Eleven o'clock Rule.

Adjourned at seven minutes after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, 18*th April*, 1907.

QUETIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Postmen's Promotion.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): To ask the Postmaster-General what is the system under which the seniority of the postmen for promotion is calculated; whether by date of Civil Service appointment or by other means; whether there is a general system all over the United Kingdom; whether it differs in any respect from the systems employed regarding sorters and sorting clerks; and, if so, what are the reasons for this different treatment.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Postmen rank as a rule according to date of appointment, though exceptions are made in cases where this practice would discount considerable unestablished service. As regards the other classes mentioned by the hon. Member, which are recruited by competition, in the case of persons entering by the same examination the place taken in the examination normally determines the seniority. The system in each case is uniform throughout the United Kingdom.

Dublin Assistant Postmen.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that there are in Dublin sixty-six assistant postmen who were formerly ex-telegraph messengers, and that despite a recent revision there are still thirty-four of them with from two to more than four years service as assistant postmen for whom there does not appear to be any immediate chance of full-time appointments; and whether, in accordance with the promise made by a previous Postmaster-General, he will take steps immediately to find full-time established appointments for these men.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The position of the ex-messenger assistant postmen at Dublin received my attention when the revision proposals referred to by the hon. Member were being considered, and, although the largest possible number of established appointments was granted, I regret that it is not at present possible to provide all those who have considerable length of service with full-time established appointments. The promise made by one of my predecessors was not as stated in the Question. It was to the effect that he would endeavour to reduce the force of assistant postmen as opportunity occurred, to such a number as would make it possible, as a general rule, for the members of that class to obtain promotion to the class of established postmen after not more than three years' service as assistant postman, and in the case of ex-telegraph messengers, as far as practicable, by the time they attained the age of twenty. In pursuance of this promise the force of assistant postmen at Dublin has been reduced from eighty-six to forty-six under the recent revision.

Sligo Land Appeals.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that out of a list of 265 Land Commission Court appeals listed to be heard by Mr. Justice Dodd at Sligo, on 18th March, 1907, and following days, it turned out that thirty-two appeals only required a hearing, the rest having been withdrawn or settled as the result of land purchase; will he say if these 265 appeals were a portion of the number of appeals pending to dispose of which Mr. Justice Dodd was appointed; and is he aware that of the appeals at present recorded as pending a very large proportion are in reference to holdings already sold to tenants and will never require to be heard.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I am informed by the Land Commission that the preliminary list for hearing at Sligo on 19th March and following days contained 265 appeals, of which sixty-four were excluded by the Judicial Commissioners from the final list. The remainder, 201, was the most that the Commissioners considered could be disposed of on the occasion. Between the dates of issuing of the final list and the date of the sitting fifty-six appeals were withdrawn by the parties, leaving 145 for hearing by the Court. Of this latter number thirty-two went to hearing, the remainder having either been settled in Court or withdrawn by the parties because purchase negotiations were pending or for other reasons. The 265 appeals referred to were included in the Return of appeals outstanding on 31st January last, subsequent to which date Mr. Justice Dodd was nominated as an additional Judicial Commissioner for the purpose of hearing such appeals. The Land Commissioners do not think that any general deduction can be drawn from what happened on this occasion. They cannot say how many of the pending appeals may ultimately be withdrawn by reason of purchase proceedings. In many such cases the fact that purchase negotiations are pending and that the appeals will not be proceeded with is not brought to the Commissioners' knowledge until the very eve of the hearing. This was specially the case in regard to the Sligo appeals.

Irish Urban Rating Law.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether a deputation representing some sixteen urban district councils from the North of Ireland recently waited on the Local Government Board for Ireland for the purpose of pointing out the serious defects in the present rating law in urban districts; and, if so, is it the intention of the Government to introduce legislation this session to amend the defects complained of.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The reply to the former part of the Question is in the affirmative. The question of introducing legislation, with the object of facilitating the collection of rates and removing certain difficulties, to which the deputation called attention, is under the consideration of the Government, but I do not think it will be possible to introduce a Bill this session.

Belfast Post Office Telegraph Department.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General how many members of the telegraph messenger staff are permanently employed on indoor duties in the telegraph department of the Belfast post office, and what is their respective rate of weekly pay; whether in rotation they are called upon to perform a duty of eight hours on one Sunday in every four without remuneration, and, if so, upon what grounds, and how many are invariably employed on duty each Sunday; and whether the members of the indoor telegraph messenger staff are the only individuals in the employment of the Post Office who are obliged to discharge Sunday duty without remuneration; and can he state the principle upon which they are thus so exceptionally treated as compared with other members of the service.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Nine telegraph messengers are permanently employed on indoor duties in the telegraph department at Belfast, they are on scale wages, 8s. by 1s. to 10s. a week. In rotation, two of them are called upon to perform about seven and a half hours duty, once every fourth Sunday, on an average. The pay for telegraph messengers, both indoor and outdoor, is based upon a weekly attendance, covering the whole seven days. There are other classes of post office servants whose weekly wages include payment for regular duty on Sundays.

West Indian Mail Subsidies.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): To ask the Postmaster-General what are the steamship subsidies paid for the conveyance of mails from this country to Jamaica and other West Indian Islands; and what is the annual sum received for postage in each case.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The only subsidy at present paid for the conveyance of mails from this country to the West Indies is† that received by Messrs. Elder, Dempster, and Company, under a contract with the Crown Agents for the Colonies, which provides for a service to and from Jamaica for commercial as well as postal purposes. The postage on mails sent from this country by this service may be estimated at about £4,000 a year.

Cavan Postal Arrangements.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will have a letter-box erected at Owengallis cross roads on the route from Bawnboy post office to Drumtober national school, in county Cavan; and, in view of the fact that this letter-box would be a convenience in the district, will he give the matter first consideration.

(Answered by Mr. Sidney Buxton.) I have called for a Report on this subject, and on its receipt I will send the hon. Member a reply.

Antrim Postal Arrangements.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the change recently effected in the delivery of letters in the Grange Corner postal area, county Antrim, has resulted in the letters addressed to certain houses in the area being delivered later instead of earlier than before; and whether he will consider the practicability and advisability of having the Grange Corner mail delivered at that post office from Randalstown instead of from Toome Bridge.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I have called for a Report on this point, and will send the hon. Member a reply.

Indian Railway Inquiry.

MR. ANNAN BRYCE (Inverness Burghs): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the urgency and importance of the Indian railway question, he is now in a position to say when the departmental inquiry alluded to in his reply to the deputation of 12th March will be instituted; what its scope will be; and what will be the constitution of the body to which it will be entrusted.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The committee of inquiry will begin work very shortly. It will be directed to inquire into and make recommendations upon the sufficiency of the amounts allotted in recent years for railway construction and equipment in India; the method of raising and applying further amounts, if such are found desirable; and the system under which the Railway Board now works. The Committee will consist of Sir James Mackay, Chairman, Sir Felix Schuster, and Mr. Abrahams representing the India Office, and Sir David Barbour and Sir Walter Lawrence representing the Indian railway companies.

Castletown Bere Estate.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork County, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Leigh White entered into negotiations for purchase with the tenants of his Castletown Bere estate, and, prior to doing so, he served a number of civil bill ejectments, some of which were for only one year's rent; and seeing that the tenants offered to leave the purchase price to the decision of the Estates Commissioners or Congested Districts Board, whether he will say what action the Estates Commissioners will take in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) Purchase agreements in respect of the estate referred to were lodged with the Estates Commissioners in December, 1905, but the case has not yet reached its turn to be dealt with. The Commissioners have no knowledge of the circumstances alleged in the question, but will, when dealing with the estate, give full consideration to any facts which may be brought to their notice by the tenants.

MR. GILHOOLY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants on the estate of Mr. Leahy, Castletown Bere, county Cork, and Mr. Leahy agreed to leave to the arbitration of the Estates Commissioners the purchase price the tenants should pay, including arrears, and that subsequently Mr. Leahy wrote to the Estates Commissioners withdrawing from that agreement, and served them with writs and civil bill ejectments; and whether, seeing that the relieving officer of the Castletown Union has been served with fourteen notices of ejectment, he will say what action the Estates Commissioners will take with regard to the sale of this estate.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The hon. Member is under a misapprehension in supposing that the landlord agreed to leave the purchase price in this case to the arbitration of the Estates Commissioners. Last autumn it was represented to the Commissioners that differences existed between the landlord and the tenants as to terms of purchase, whereupon the Commissioners offered their services as conciliators under the Lord-Lieutenant's regulations. At an interview between the Commissioners, the landlord's agent, and the tenant's representatives, it was suggested that the Commissioners should have the holdings inspected, with the object of estimating, for the consideration of the parties, the prices which should be given. The landlord, however, declined to permit inspection or to consider terms of sale for the part of the property in dispute, alleging that the tenants on that part of the property had declined to pay rent for the last year. In the circumstances the Commissioners were obliged to withdraw from the matter, and cannot take further action.

Ballingeary Assault Case.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at the recent hearing, at Macroom petty sessions, of some cases of alleged assault against a number of young girls from Ballingeary, the presiding magistrate was Mr. O'Hara, resident magistrate; will he say if Mr. O'Hara was formally moved to the chair by his brother magistrates, or if he took it as if it were a right appertaining to his position as resident magistrate; does any such right exist; and, if not, will an instruction be issued to Irish resident magistrates that they should not take the chair at petty sessions unless they are moved to it by their brother magistrates in the usual course.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I am informed that there was no formal moving to the chair on the occasion mentioned, but Mr. O'Hara was asked to take it by the majority of the magistrates present at the opening of the court. A resident magistrate is not chairman of petty sessions by virtue of his office. It rests with the magistrates present at each court of petty sessions to select one of their number as chairman, but whether by a formal vote or by general concurrence is a matter entirely for themselves. Mr. O'Hara informs me that he has never assumed a right to take the chair, and I have no information that any other resident magistrate has claimed such a right. In the circumstances there does not appear to be any reason for issuing instructions in the matter.

Kilfinane Town Tenants.

MR. SHEEHAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received any application from the tenants in the town of Kilfinane requesting them to advance money for the purchase of their holdings; does this town form a portion of an estate which is mainly agricultural and on which a sale to the rural tenants has already taken place; and will he explain the powers of the Estates Commissioners to advance money for the purchase of their holdings to town tenants in circumstances such as the present.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have received from the town tenants referred to an application that their holdings should be included in the sale of Colonel Gascoigne's estate, and have directed their inspector to inquire into the matter. Proceedings for the sale of the rural portion of the estate have been instituted before the Commissioners. The general question of advances for the purchase of town or village holdings is dealt with in the Lord-Lieutenant's regulations of 13th November, 1906, to which I beg to refer the hon. Member.

Coachford Evicted Tenant.

MR. SHEEHAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners received an application for reinstatement from an evicted tenant named Jeremiah Murphy, formerly of Aharrin, Coachford, county Cork, on the Bowen-Colthurst estate; has a sale been arranged to the tenants on this estate, and have these made it a condition of purchase that Murphy should be reinstated; have different inspectors of the Estates Commissioners inquired into the claims of this evicted tenant; and, if so, what has been the nature of their reports; did the middleman, Mr. J. H. Weldon, Killmallock, inform any of the inspectors that he was willing to dispose of his interest for a reasonable sum to the Estates Commissioners; and will he state the number of inspectors through whose hands the claim of this evicted tenant has passed.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have received Jeremiah Murphy's application for reinstatement. No proceedings for the sale of the estate have been instituted before the Commissioners, but they are informed that terms of purchase have been arranged with the tenants, who, however, are unwilling to sign agreements until Murphy is reinstated. Two of the Commissioners' inspectors have visited the farm, and have approached the middleman, Mr. Weldon, with a view to purchasing it. Mr. Weldon has not yet stated what sum he would require for his interest. The matter is still pending.

Coolroe Estate, Wexford.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the owner of the Coolroe estate has offered it for sale to the Estates Commissioners; and whether any progress has yet been made with regard to the restoration of the Coolroe evicted tenants to their homes.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The owner of the estate mentioned has intimated his willingness to accept the price provisionally offered by the Estates Commissioners, and proceedings for the sale have accordingly been instituted. The case has not yet reached a stage at which the matter of the evicted tenants can be dealt with.

Woolwich Arsenal.

SIR BERKELEY SHEFFIELD (Lancashire, Brigg): To ask the Secretary of State for War how many boxes of ammunition there are waiting in Woolwich Arsenal for repair and overhaul.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) It is assumed that the Question refers to boxes for ammunition. A large number are now being repaired, and others will be dealt with during the year as they are required for use. The requirements of these boxes will only mature pro rata as filling work, etc., proceeds during the ensuing twelve months.

Colonial Premiers and the Reserve Forces.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): To ask the Secretary of State for War if no opportunity is to be afforded the Colonial Statesmen now in the Mother Country of seeing the Yeomanry and Volunteer Forces, having regard to the efforts they are making in the several Colonies to develop national defence.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) No effort will be spared to procure for the Colonial Statesmen now in this country such opportunities as they may desire of acquiring information in regard to the Yeomanry and Volunteers.

Gun Velocities.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): To ask the Secretary of State for War, if he can state the remaining velocity and angle of descent at a range of 5,900 yards, of the projectiles of the British 18-pounder quick-firing, British 15-pounder (converted), and latest models of French and German quick-firing field-guns, respectively; and also the angle of elevation corresponding to this range which has to be given to the gun in each case.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The figures for the British and German guns are as follow. There is no reliable information available as regards the French guns:—

	British.		German.
	18-Pounder Quick-firing.	15-Pounder B. L. Converted.
Remaining Velocity - -	743 f. s.	655 f. s.	756 f. s.
Angle of Descent - - -	23° 3′	25° 6′	22° 3′

Tidworth Barracks Hospital.

CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether it can now be stated at what date the building of the new hospital at Tidworth barracks will commence.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) It is not possible to give a definite date, but the work in preparation for the new hospital work is so far advanced as to render it possible in a short period to arrange a contract.

Norfolk and Suffolk Artillery.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): To ask the Secretary of State for War if the 1st Norfolk (Prince of Wales' Own) Artillery and the 1st Suffolk Artillery will be embodied as usual during the present year; and where their training will take place.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The hon. Member apparently alludes to the annual training of two regiments, called respectively the Prince of Wales' Own Norfolk Royal Garrison Artillery Militia and the Suffolk Artillery Militia. The former regiment will train at Great Yarmouth from the 20th May to 8th June, and the latter at Harwich from 10th June to 29th June.

Nenagh Garrison.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has received a memorial from the Nenagh Urban Council, the magistrates of county Tipperary, and the people of Nenagh, praying him to cause the reconsideration of the removal of the present military from Nenagh, in view of the feeling that has sprung up between them and the people of Nenagh of all creeds and classes; and whether he can state the nature of the reply to this memorial.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) No such memorial has been received at the War Office.

Army Scheme—County Associations.

CAPTAIN HERVEY (Bury St. Edmunds): To ask the Secretary of State for War if it is intended, under the Territorial and Reserve Forces Bill, that the establishment of county associations should be permissive; and, if they are permissive, what would happen to the existing organisation of the Militia, Volunteers, and Yeomanry in counties where associations were not formed.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) In accordance with the terms of the Bill the associations need not be all established at once, but may be formed progressively. Until associations are actually formed the existing powers in relation to the Auxiliary Forces will continue.

Pay of Lieutenant-Colonels.

Mr. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): To ask the Secretary of State for War what sum has been taken in the Estimate for 1907–8 to meet the service of increasing the pay of lieutenant-colonels.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) I am in communication with the Treasury as to the rate of increase per arm, and I am not yet in a position to state the exact figures.

Cost of Autumn Manœuvres.

Mr. COURTHOPE: To ask the Secretary of State for War what has been the total cost from all sources of autumn manœuvres during the last three financial years; and what sum has been provided for manœuvres during 1907–8.

The expenditure on the two items is not shown separately.

Second Division Clerks.

Mr. FIELD: (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state the total number of clerks, neither Second Division nor university graduates, who were admitted, without Civil Service examination, to the Colonial Audit Branch in London from its establishment in 1889 to the date of its reorganisation in 1906; and the length of service, the rate of salary, and the present position of each of such clerks now serving at Home or Abroad.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The length of service, rate of salary, and present position of those still serving are as follows:—

1	18 years 2 months	486	Chief Examiner, Headquarters (formerly Local Auditor, Gibraltar).
2	15 ,, 10 ,,	300	Local Auditor, Gibraltar (receives £50 for auditing Dockyard Accounts, £86 for the audit of Municipal Accounts).
3	12 ,, 4 ,,	460	Local Auditor, Uganda.
4	8 ,, 5 ,,	300	Assistant Auditor, East Africa.
5	7 ,, 11 ,,	320	Assistant Auditor, Uganda.
6	7 ,, 6 ,,	440	Local Auditor, Gold Coast.
7	6 ,, 10 ,,	340	Assistant Auditor, East Africa.
8	6 ,, 6 ,,	430	Local Auditor, British Central Africa.
9	5 ,, 1 ,,	360	Assistant Auditor, Southern Nigeria.
10	4 ,, 8 ,,	310	Assistant Auditor, Northern Nigeria.
11	4 ,, 6 ,,	100	Examiner, Headquarters.
12	4 ,, 2 ,,	310	Assistant Auditor, Southern Nigeria.
13	3 ,, 1 ,,	300	Assistant Auditor, Southern Nigeria.

Second Division Clerk Examinations.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether Second Division clerks who entered the Exchequer and Audit Department, prior to its reorganisation in 1906, generally scored high marks in book-keeping at the various examinations in which they were successful; whether book-keeping is now included in the competitive part of the examination for new entrants, and, if not, will he explain why.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The appointment of Second Division clerks to the Exchequer and Audit Department did not depend upon their proficiency in book-keeping, which was an optional subject. The new scheme of examination for the Exchequer and Audit Department which applies also to certain appointments under the War Office and Admiralty, has been framed, after conference with eminent head masters representing various types of higher grade schools, to attract able youths who have been educated in public schools, grammar schools, or other higher grade schools up to the age of eighteen or nineteen. Book-keeping is not included among the subjects, because book-keeping does not form part of the ordinary curriculum of many of the schools in question. Candidates are, however, required to pass in arithmetic; and it is provided that no candidate shall be confirmed in his appointment unless he has, during the probationary period, satisfied the Comptroller and Auditor-General that he has gained a sufficient knowledge of book-keeping by single and double entry.

Annual Leave in the Exchequer and Audit Department.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether he will grant a statement showing the annual leave allowed to each rank in the Exchequer and Audit Department, including the Comptroller and Auditor-General and the Assistant Comptroller.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I learn that the scale of leave authorised by the Comptroller and Auditor-General for the various ranks of the Exchequer and Audit Department is as follows:—

	Per annum.
Principal and senior clerks -	48 days.
Chief examiners - - -	36 ,,
Examiners - - - -	24 ,,
After 10 years service -	30 ,,
After 20 years service -	36 ,,

The Comptroller and Assistant Comptroller conform to the rules applicable to the Civil Service generally.

Code Telegrams.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been drawn to the frequency of mistakes made in code telegrams, and to the fact that a majority of these do not probably come under his official notice owing to the loss of time involved in addressing such complaints to local postmasters; whether he is aware of the probability of any telegram being misread so long as the present method of transcribing messages in pencil is continued; and whether he is prepared to consider the question of directing all telegrams in future to be typewritten.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I do not think such mistakes are frequent, having regard to the great number of telegrams transmitted. The question of typewritten telegrams is engaging my attention. Experiments have been made, but the results have not been altogether satisfactory. I believe that as a rule telegrams are clearly and legibly written, and I have had but little complaint on the subject.

Addresses of Private Telegrams.

SIR H. COTTON: To ask the Postmaster-General whether, having regard to the inconvenience and annoyance caused by private telegrams having been opened by persons other than the addressees owing to the illegibility of the lead pencil directions on paper of the colour now used, he can see his way either to abolish the use of the present coloured envelope in all cases, or, as an alternative, to direct that telegrams bearing the words private, confidential, or similar indications, shall be delivered in envelopes on which lead pencil writing is more distinctly legible.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I cannot do better than repeat to the hon. Member the substance of a reply which I gave to the chamber of commerce of his constituency on this point a month ago. I said that exception was very rarely taken to the colour of the present telegram envelopes; any change in its colour would probably give rise to much complaint; that Postmasters-General had from time to time been urged to use distinctive envelopes for various classes of telegrams, but that the multiplication of forms of official stationary used at postal telegraph offices was most undesirable, and would undoubtedly tend to certain delay and possible mistakes in the treatment of telegrams.

Census Advisory Committees.

SIR A. SPICER (Hackney, Central): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the provisions of Section 9 of The Census of Production Act, 1906, stipulating that the advisory committees should include persons engaged in as well as conversant with the conditions of various trades and industries, he has taken steps for the appointment of such advisory committees; by what process it is proposed to select the members; and whether it is intended to invite nominations from chambers of commerce in the principal industrial centres.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) A general committee has been appointed to advise upon the general scope of the census of production, and the lines upon which the information required is to be obtained. Steps are being taken to appoint other committees to consider the special requirements of particular trades, which will include leading manufacturers and representatives of trade associations. Committees for the building, iron and steel, cotton, woollen and worsted, engineering, shipbuilding, and boot and shoe trades are at present in course of formation, and in each case the leading trade associations have been invited to suggest members. The question of the appointment of further committees is under consideration, and a similar method of selection will be adopted in these cases.

His Majesty's Customs Tide Surveyor.

MR. W. HOPE (Somersetshire, N.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether a tide surveyor, in the employ of His Majesty's Customs, has the right to take from boatmen timber which they have salved, when the boatmen have found the owners, and the timber, being only good for firewood, has been given by the owners to the boatmen.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) It is laid down in the Merchant Shipping Acts that all wreck found by persons other than the owner must be delivered to the receiver of wreck. This officer, however, has instructions to permit any article which is proved to his satisfaction to belong to parties on the spot to be delivered by the salvors to such parties at once without demanding any fee, provided that there is no question as to salvage or customs duties, and of course in such a case the owner may do what he likes with it.

Shettleston Free Church Property.

MR. REMNANT (Finsbury, Holborn): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the Church Commissioners have decided that all the Free Church property in Shettleston shall be allocated to the United Free Church; and whether, in view of the fact that there is a substantial Free Church congregation in the district who will be left without a place in which to worship, the Commissioners will consider the advisability of making some financial provision for the religious needs of this congregation.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) I understand that the Church Commissioners have decided that the Free Church property in Shettleston must be allocated to the United Free Church. The rest of the hon. Member's Question refers to matters which the Act leaves entirely to the discretion of the Commissioners, with which I cannot interfere.

Hanwell Vaccination Exemption Certificate.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that Mr. Reginald Hayles, of Hanwell, applied twice to the magistrates at the Brentford police court, on 2nd and 16th March, for an exemption under the Vaccination Act, 1898, and was refused; and what steps he proposes taking to give the conscientious objector a fair hearing.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I have received two letters from Mr. Hales calling my attention to the case. The amendment of the law is under consideration by my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board.

Privilege Cabs.

Mr. C. B. HARMSWORTH (Worcestershire, Droitwich): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is in a position to state when it is proposed to give effect to the unanimous recommendation of the Cabs and Omnibuses (Metropolis) Committee that the privilege system for cabs at metropolitan railway stations should be provisionally abolished for one year.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) As the hon. Member is probably aware, I approached the railway companies, but they saw great difficulties in the way of carrying out my proposals. I am still in communication with them, and I still have hopes of obtaining the desired result by friendly arrangement. Owing to the number and different characteristics of the different stations affected the question is far from simple, but I am pressing forward my negotiations, and I have not relaxed in any way my declared intention of dealing with the matter.

Municipal Indebtedness.

Mr. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is in a position to state the total amount of the municipal debt of England and Wales to the end 1906; also the annual cost of such debt, including interest.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I presume that the Question refers to the debt of all local authorities in England and Wales, and not merely to that of town councils. The latest available figures relate to the year ended March, 1904, and these show that the outstanding loans then amounted to £393,882,146, and that the loan charges in that year (including interest, repayment of principal, and sums paid to sinking funds) amounted to £21,675,645.

Midwifery.

Mr. ASHTON (Bedfordshire, Luton): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that there are only nineteen counties in England and Wales in which there are institutions approved by the Central Midwives Board for the training of midwives; and that there are only fifty-two approved institutions in England and Wales, of which thirty-five are voluntary and only seventeen Poor Law institutions, of which again six are in London and only eleven in the rest of the country; whether he will say if the Paddington, Farnham, and Epsom infirmaries are yet approved; whether in the voluntary institutions the probationers have to pay fees, and whether in the Poor Law institutions they pay none; and if he can state what way the fees payable in the voluntary institutions are generally disposed of.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I understand that the figures in the Question are substantially correct, the precise figures being as follows:—

Counties in England and Wales in which there are institutions approved by the Central Midwives Board for the training of midwives - - - - - -	19
Approved institutions in England and Wales (of which there are 35 voluntary (i.e., non-Poor Law), and 16 Poor Law, of the latter there are 6 in London and 10 in the provinces) - - - -	51

The Paddington, Farnham, and Epsom infirmaries have not been approved. I have no information as to the payment and application of fees in voluntary institutions. In Poor Law institutions there are usually no fees.

Proposed Vizamgam-Malia Railway.

Mr. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether the memorial from the Cutchi public of Bombay, urging that the proposed Vizamgam-Malia railway line should pass through the territory of the Rao of Cutch, has now been received and considered; has the Report on the reconnaissance of the two alternative routes yet been received and considered, and if any fresh reconnaissance has been ordered will he state its nature; and will he state when a decision as to the route to be adopted is likely to be arrived at.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I have nothing to add to the Answer which I gave to a similar Question asked by the hon. Member in December last.† I cannot state when a decision as to the route to be adopted is likely to be arrived at. So far as I am aware there is no intention on the part of the Government of India of proceeding with the construction of the Bombay-Sind connection at present.

Bengal Indian Education Service.

MR. MCCALLUM (Paisley): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether, having regard to the fact that only one Native of India has during the past seventeen years been appointed to the Indian educational service in Bengal, he will consider the claims of highly qualified graduates of English Universities who are Natives of India, and now serving in the provincial service, to promotion to the Indian education service.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The Indian educational service, as distinguished from the provincial service, is intended to supply what is at present considered to be the minimum of European appointments necessary to ensure the due progress of education in India, and it is therefore intended to be recruited mainly from Europeans, and must for the present continue so to be recruited. I may explain that it differs from the provincial service only in so far as its pay and other conditions are fixed with reference to the scale necessary to attract Europeans, which is naturally higher than that required to secure Indians serving in their own country.

Irish Education Grant.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, is he aware that the Estimates presented to Parliament provide a sum of £2,000,000 and upwards for public education in Scotland and only £1,400,000 for Ireland, though the number of children to be educated in Ireland is practically equal to the number in Scotland; and will he say what is the reason for the difference, and take steps to bring the grant to Ireland up to that for Scotland.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I am afraid that I cannot, within the limits of an Answer, discuss the question which the hon. and learned Member raises. I have repeatedly stated that the Irish Government are doing everything in their power to obtain adequate recognition of the claims of Ireland in respect of education.

Bundoran Evicted Tenant.

MR. DOLAN (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what steps are being taken by the Estates Commissioners to bring about the restoration of Francis M'Guinness, Bundoran, to the holding on the Tottenham estate, county Leitrim, from which his father was evicted.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners are unable to trace the receipt from Francis M'Guinness of any application for reinstatement.

Glenboy Fair Rent Cases.

MR. DOLAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that it is the practice of the agent on the G. S. Clements estate, Glenboy, county Leitrim, to have all applications for the fixing of fair rents transferred from the jurisdiction of the county court judge; and will he state by what authority the agent is thus enabled to prevent these applications being heard within any reasonable time.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Land Commission inform me that five out of six pending applications to fix judicial rents on the estate mentioned were transferred from the Civil Bill Court on the 6th March. The applications were transferred to the Land Commission on the application of the landlord made under the powers conferred by the provisions of Section 37, sub-section (4), of The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, no cause against such transfer having been shown by the tenants.

Inspection of Irish Schools.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the rule by which inspectors of national schools are bound to give notice of the annual inspection to both teachers and managers is in many instances not observed; and will he see that this rule is enforced and the date fixed in future.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that under their rules the inspectors are not required to give notice of their intended visits to schools except when they propose to hold a formal inspection annual or otherwise. The Commissioners are not aware that inspectors have failed to give notice of their intention to hold formal annual inspections.

Royal Irish Constabulary Cadets.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether it is intended to hold any more examinations for Royal Irish Constabulary cadets; and whether the holding of these examinations is due to the insufficient supply of head constables qualified to fulfil the duties of district inspector.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) An examination is to be held on the 7th May. Under the existing regulations half of the examinations in the rank of district inspector are filled by the appointment of cadets and half by the promotion of head constables. Formerly only one-fourth of the vacancies was given to head constables.

Royal Irish Constabulary Barracks.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, to what extent separate sanitary accommodation is provided for the wives and children of members of the Royal Irish Constabulary living in barracks; whether there is any exception to the rule that one convenience only is provided for men, women, and children, as well as prisoners of both sexes; what means have the constabulary authorities of ascertaining that the sanitary accommodation of Royal Irish Constabulary barracks is wholesome; and whether the surgeon to the force exercises any supervision in this respect.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) Separate sanitary accommodation for women and children is almost invariably provided at the larger stations, but it is not possible to provide such accommodation at many of the small rural stations where the premises are small. The latter stations are usually occupied by one married constable only, and in such case the necessity for separate sanitary accommodation is not so marked. Constabulary stations are periodically inspected by county and district inspectors, as well as by officers from headquarters, so that ample opportunity is afforded for bringing to notice any defects in the sanitary arrangements. The local medical attendants advise on all matters affecting the health of the men and their families, and the sanitary condition of the barracks. The surgeon of the force, who is attached to the depot, exercises no supervision in this respect.

Upper Ballinagh Evicted Tenant.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will say whether the Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement from Thomas Forster, of Aughaweely, Upper Ballinagh, county Cavan, whose father, John Foster, was evicted from his farm in the same townland about twenty years ago, held under the Reverend Francis Sclater; will he say if the Estates Commissioners have inquired into the claim; and when is the matter likely to be dealt with.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners cannot trace the receipt from Thomas Foster of any application for reinstatement.

Callan Evicted Tenant.

Mr. O'MARA (Kilkenny, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether negotiations for the sale of the Madden estate, Callan, county Kilkenny, are now proceeding; and, if so, what steps are being taken to reinstate Mr. Richard O'Mahony, an evicted tenant, on this estate; and whether he will consider the expediency of making public the report of Mr. Smyth, the inspector, who inquired into this matter.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have made inquiries into the application of Richard Mahony. The landlord objects to any interference with the present occupier of the evicted holding, and the Commissioners understand that Mahony already occupies a farm of 112 acres elsewhere. The Comissioners have therefore decided to take no action in the matter. The reports of their inspectors are confidential documents and cannot be published.

Dingle Harbour Board.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Harbour Board of Dingle, county Kerry, have sent memorials asking for grants for the extension of the pier or the further dredging of the harbour; and whether, seeing that Dingle is one of the best fishing ports in the whole of Ireland, and that the present pier was built without any Government contribution, and the harbour authorities have gone into debt in trying to make the harbour suitable for fishing, and in view of the congested nature of the surrounding country and the dependence of the people on fishing, some assistance will be given to enable them to carry on this industry.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I am informed that the Dingle Board addressed to my predecessor a memorial asking for a grant of £5,000 for the purpose of extending the pier by 160 feet. The Board of Works, however, reported that the proposed extension would not effect the desired end; it would not reach out to low-water mark, and the chief advantage to be gained would be merely increased quay accommodation. The hon. Member is under a misapprehension in supposing that the existing pier was built without Government contribution. More than half of the cost was provided from State funds. The Congested Districts Board contributed £500 last year towards the cost of dredging the harbour. They have been obliged, owing to the state of their funds, to refuse a contribution this year.

Northumberland Artillery Militia.

Sir ROBERT HOBART (Hampshire, New Forest): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Northumberland Artillery Militia can be called out, assembled, and trained this year at Tynemouth, where the Castle Barracks are now empty, their arms and accoutrements being sent from Berwick, thus avoiding expense to the public; whether there is a battery at Tynemouth armed with modern guns, which do not exist at Berwick; and whether there is ample camping ground adjoining the Castle Barracks on which the Durham Artillery Militia, with a strength of 200 men more than the Northumberland Artillery Militia, have been previously trained.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) All arrangements for training and camps of the auxiliary forces are in the hands of the general officers commanding-in-chief. The matter raised will, however, be brought to the notice of the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief concerned.

Exchequer and Audit Department—Press Communication.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that an order has been recently issued in the Exchequer and Audit Department threatening with instant dismissal any employee who communicates information to the Press or to any outside person whatsoever; whether he will state who is responsible for the issue of this order; whether a Member of Parliament is entitled to obtain information respecting maladministration in any Government department, provided the Official Secrets Act is not contravened; and whether, seeing that this order would deprive the House of Commons of the power of criticising the permanent officials, he will take measures to have the order annulled and prevent its repetition.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) The order to which the hon. Member refers is presumably the rule which, I am informed, has for a long time been operative in the department, and which prohibits communication to the Press of information derived from official sources. This rule is based upon the Treasury Minute of 3rd June, 1873, which, together with another Minute on a similar subject, was presented to Parliament in 1884 [Cd. 3951]. I do not think that the rule has the results suggested by the hon. Member, nor do I think it is expedient to alter or withdraw the Minute.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Promotion in the Navy.

MR. JOWETT (Bradford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Board are prepared to introduce into the Navy the principle of promotion exclusively by merit; and, if so, when do they propose to abolish the automatic promotions each year from the Royal Yacht.

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. LAMBERT, Devonshire, South Molton): Promotion in the Navy is determined exclusively by merit, and the special promotions from His Majesty's Yacht are no exception to the rule, as only officers who merited promotion are appointed to her.

*MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): Is not promotion from the Royal Yacht automatic and not by merit, and is the hon. Member aware that it has been officially stated in this House that in the ten years ending 31st December, 1905, forty-three commissioned officers of the executive branch have been thus automatically promoted?

MR. LAMBERT: No. Promotion in the Navy is exclusively by merit.

His Majesty's Ship "Dreadnought."

SIR BERKELEY SHEFFIELD (Lincolnshire, Brigg); I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how long His Majesty's Ship "Dreadnought" was kept waiting for her 12-pounder ammunition recently; whether this delay was due to the inability of Woolwich Arsenal to cope with the work owing to shortage of hands; and, if not, to what other cause is the delay attributable.

MR. LAMBERT: His Majesty's Ship "Dreadnought" has not been kept waiting for her 12-pounder ammunition. A demand recently preferred at Portsmouth for reduced charges, which do not form part of the fighting equipment of the ship, could not immediately be complied with in full locally, but the balance is available elsewhere. The suggestion in the second sentence of the question is without foundation.

H.M.S. "Phœnix."

MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if H.M.S. "Phœnix" has been sold; and, if so, what was the price realised and received; and by what ship the "Phœnix" has now been replaced.

MR. LAMBERT: The "Phœnix" was sold at Hong Kong by public auction and realised £2,242. As this vessel was one of a number of small craft reduced from the active strength of the fleet in December, 1904, it is not proposed to replace her.

The Coastguard.

MR. HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether it has been decided to abolish the coastguard; if so, by whom are their duties to be discharged; and, if the coastguard is to be abolished or reduced, what men are to take their place as a reserve for the Royal Navy.

MR LAMBERT: I have nothing to add to the reply to my hon. friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland on the 21st November last.†

H.M.S. "Furious"—Case of Stoker Keeley.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the case of H. Keeley, now residing at 313, Battle Road, Hollington, near Hastings, who was severely injured by an explosion on board H.M.S. "Furious," at Gibraltar, in the winter of 1902–3; whether he is aware that, on that occasion, Keeley enabled all others to escape by his promptitude in giving the alarm, while he himself remained in the stokehold to draw the fires; and that, as a result of injuries received on this occasion, Keeley became subject to fits, in consequence of which he was invalided out of the Navy in September, 1906, and is now, owing to their increasing frequency, unable to work or to go out unattended; and whether the Admiralty will grant him a greater pension than 6d. per diem.

† See (4) Debates, clxv., 813.

MR. LAMBERT: There is no record of any such explosion or of any injury to Keeley. The disability for which he was invalided was not attributable to the Service, and the pension of 6½d. a day which he has been granted is the full amount which the circumstances of his case entitle him to receive from naval funds under the Regulations.

Anti-Opium Movement in the Malay Peninsula.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the meeting of the anti-opium societies of the Malay Peninsula, held at Ipoh on 8th March last, at which resolutions were carried demanding the abolition of all opium farms and the substitution for them of Government depôts and complete Government control, and also urging that compulsory registration of all opium smokers, as in Formosa and the Philippines, should be enforced by law; and whether the Government will take any action in the direction indicated.

I beg also to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the resolution recorded at the conference of the anti-opium societies of the Malay Peninsula, held at Ipoh on 8th March last, to the effect that the Government be requested to pass additional rules under the chandu shops enactment forbidding the sale of opium to any person under twenty-one years of age, and also forbidding the sale and use of opium in brothels, jinriksha depots, and other such public places; and whether the Government will take any action in the direction indicated.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): I have seen a newspaper report of this meeting. His Majesty's Government are giving careful consideration to the opium question.

Opium Smoking in Penang.

SIR H. COTTON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to a Chinese proclamation issued by the Protector of Chinese in Penang on 8th February, 1907, and given by him to the opium farmers for distribution, the effect of which is to encourage opium smoking in the Colony; and whether, having regard to this unusual procedure and to the objection to a Chinese protector becoming a protector of Chinese vice, the Government will indicate to the Governor of the Straits Settlements their disapproval of the terms of this notice.

MR. CHURCHILL: I have seen in a newspaper what purports to be a translation of this notification. The Governor of the Straits Settlements will be asked for a report on the subject.

White Police in British East Africa.

MR. NIELD: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the size and nature of the force of white police now being recruited for British East Africa.

MR. CHURCHILL: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the Question of the hon. Member for the Kingston Division on the 10th instant,† to which the Secretary of State has nothing to add.

Transvaal Government and Chinese Coolie Repatriation.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies in view of the establishment of responsible government in the Transvaal, whether the arrangement for repatriation of Chinese coolies from Imperial funds is to continue; and, if so, for what period.

MR. CHURCHILL: This matter is forming the subject of discussion with the new Government, but no decision has yet been reached.

The Nairobi Case—Captain Grogan.

MR. CAVE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Captain Ewart Grogan, now imprisoned in East Africa for holding an unlawful meeting at Nairobi, is the explorer of that name who, during his march from the Cape to Cairo, was for some months in the interior of Africa accompanied only by Native servants; whether Captain Grogan some time since, with a view to assisting in the development of British East Africa, settled at Nairobi with his family, and induced some of his friends to take the same course; whether Captain Grogan, as chairman of the Colonists' Association, lately represented to the local authorities that the attitude of the Wakikuyu towards the white population has changed for the worse, and requested that increased police protection should be afforded to the settlers; whether his representations were disregarded until he publicly caned three of his boys for deliberate insults to English women; whether, immediately after that occurrence, the Secretary of State authorised the raising of twenty, since increased to forty, white police for the protection of the settlers, and on whose recommendation the authority was given; and whether it is in consequence of a crowd having collected while the boys were flogged that Captain Grogan and his friends have been convicted of holding an unlawful meeting and imprisoned.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State has no official information as to Captain Grogan's explorations. He has now been for some little time resident in East Africa, and has obtained a large forest concession from the Government which so far he has not developed. The Secretary of State is not aware that, previous to the flogging of the natives on the 14th March last, Captain Grogan had made the representations referred to by the hon. Member. The raising of a small white police force had for some time been recommended by the Commissioner of the Protectorate, and provision for raising it was inserted in the Estimates for the financial year 1907–8, which were prepared in the Protectorate as far back as November last. The increase of the number from twenty to forty was, however, decided upon in order to deal with such lawless acts as that of which Captain Grogan has been guilty. It is clear from the reports received that Captain Grogan and his follow-offenders announced their purpose of flogging the natives in a public place with a view of inducing a crowd to assemble to witness and participate in their unlawful acts. The House must not assume that I admit that the expression "caning three boys for deliberate insults to white women" expresses at all accurately what took place.

AN HON. MEMBER: Will the hon. Gentleman inquire as to the alleged discontent among the whites?

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): Is it not the fact that this alleged discontent is very largely caused by the alienation of large tracts of land from the natives?

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): Will the hon. Gentleman inquire if the representations referred to in the Question were made?

MR. CHURCHILL: It is very difficult to see how such inquiry can be made.

MR. CARLILE: It is not for me to guide the hon. Gentleman.

MR. CAVE: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether Captain Grogan contracted a dangerous illness while serving in the Matabele war, and has lately had a return of such illness; whether he is imprisoned at Nairobi or Mombasa; and, if the former, whether on the high or low ground.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Secretary of State has been informed that the facts as to Captain Grogan's medical history are as stated in the first part of the hon. Member's question. He has ascertained that he is now in good health and is confined in a house on the high ground at Nairobi, where he is daily visited by a medical officer.

MR. CAVE: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies when Papers on the subject of the Nairobi incident will be laid upon the Table.

MR. CHURCHILL: Papers will be laid in due course, but I cannot fix a date at present.

Sir Alexander Swettenham.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies when the Paper referring to Sir Alexander Swettenham's resignation will be issued.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Paper will be presented immediately.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Will it include the letter of the American admiral to Sir Alexander Swettenham, as well as the latter's reply, and also—what is most important to the House and the public—the letter sent by the mayor to the admiral and the admiral's reply?

MR. CHURCHILL: I think the right hon. Gentleman had better await the publication of the Paper. In some respects it will fulfil his wishes, and in others it will fall short of them.

German Settlements in the Far East—Sales of Opium.

SIR H. COTTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the German Government has agreed to suppress the sale and consumption of opium and morphia in the German settlements in China and at Tsingtau (Kiaochow.)

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): We have no information on the subject at present.

SIR H. COTTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire?

SIR EDWARD GREY: No, Sir, it is a matter on which the German Government act on their own responsibilities.

British Trade in Eastern Persia.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the active participation of the Consuls of other Powers in commercial affairs in Eastern Persia, our own Consuls have received instructions to forward the interests of British trade.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Consuls in Persia have instructions, as have Consuls elsewhere, to accord to British enterprise all the assistance that it can properly receive, and quite understand what their duties are. There is no occasion for special instructions in this instance.

Mesopotamia Oil Concessions.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has now received any information showing that a concession of the deposits of mineral oil in Mesopotamia has been granted by the Porte to the persons representing the Anatolian Railway; and whether this concession is still in force.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Information has been asked for from His Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople, but not yet received.

Congo Free State—Lado Enclave.

MR. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what is the length of the lease of the Lado Enclave to the Congo Free State; and whether there is any power to determine the lease at an earlier date or to cancel it for any cause and regain possession of this tract of country, so as to have it administered by Englishmen and not by officials of the Congo Free State.

SIR EDWARD GREY: In Answer to the first Question, I have to refer the hon. Member to Article 1 of the agreement of 12th May, 1906, between the Congo State and the United Kingdom (published in Treaty Series No. 4, 1906). The Answer to the second Question is in the negative.

Egyptian Agent-General.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the status and powers of the new Agent-General in Egypt will be identical with those of his predecessor.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Answer is in the affirmative.

New Hebrides.

MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the Anglo-French Commission dealing with the New Hebrides is to meet; whether amendments of the labour regulations will be made; and, if so, on what specific points.

MR. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether in any future negotiations with the French Government about the New Hebrides Convention, or in any instructions which may be issued to British officials, the suggestions made by the Prime Minister of Australia, in his despatch of the 13th June, 1906, for the better protection of the indentured labourers, will be fully considered by His Majesty's Government; and whether special consideration will be given to those sections of the Convention which deal with the engagement of women and children, the hours of labour, the rate of wages, and the conditions of repatriation.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Answer to both parts of the last Question of the hon. Member for the Newbury Division is in the affirmative. But I may point out that the Anglo-French Committee which is shortly to meet is not intended to deal with the Convention generally, but only to discuss certain details of working of the Joint Court. I may add, with regard to the last part of the Question, that it must be some time before any licences at all can be issued under the Convention, and before any such licences are issued it will be made quite clear by the instructions given to the British authorities that the points indicated in the Question will be thoroughly safeguarded as regards all licences issued by them. His Majesty's Government have already communicated with the High Commissioner for the Western Pacific with regard to the appointment of sufficient labour inspectors to ensure that abuses do not arise as regards indentured labour employed by subjects under British jurisdiction after licences have been issued.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): Will the right hon. Gentleman lay a copy of the instructions on the Table of the House?

SIR EDWARD GREY: I undertake that the instructions issued by the Colonial Office will be laid on the Table of the House.

Egypt—Sugar Royalty on Refined Sugar.

DR. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there exists in Egypt and the Soudan, or in either and which of those countries, a royalty on the manufacture, importation, exportation, or sale of refined sugar; if so, what is the amount of such royalty; and whether it is intended to abolish wholly, or to reduce to any and what extent, such royalty and to replace it by one upon unrefined sugar.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I am not aware of the existence of any such royalty. I will inquire. But, with regard to the latter part of the Question, I must point out that it is for obvious reasons the rule in this country not to announce an intention to alter duties before a decision has been arrived at, and the same reasons would, I assume, be equally applicable to Egypt.

Egyptian Pharmacy Laws.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, seeing that under the new Pharmacy Law of Egypt no power of search or seizure is given, he will advise the Egyptian Government to amend the law so as to create such powers as regards natives, who form the great majority of the illicit vendors of poisons.

SIR EDWARD GREY: It is not a case in which His Majesty's Government can interfere with the discretion of the Egyptian Government.

Canadian Tariffs—Sir Richard Cartwright's Statement.

MR. PIKE PEASE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether his attention has been called to the statement of Sir Richard Cartwright, acting Prime Minister of Canada in the absence of Sir Wilfred Laurier, made in the Canadian Senate on 11th April, as to the negotiations it was proposed to conduct immediately after the Colonial Conference to bring into force the Canadian intermediate tariff with certain foreign countries; will he state what are the foreign countries in question, and whether the negotiations would be conducted through the Foreign Office, whether the conclusion of such treaties on the basis of the intermediate tariff would automatically diminish the value of the British preference; and whether such negotiations would in any way bind the action of Canada in extending further preference to the United Kingdom.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have not yet seen a report of the speech referred to, and am not aware what are the countries in question. The negotiations with Foreign Powers would, of course, be conducted through the proper channels in a manner agreed upon between the Canadian Government and His Majesty's Government. The application of the intermediate tariff would reduce, pro tanto, the preference granted to British goods; but the grant of the intermediate tariff to any foreign country would not, apparently, prevent the Canadian Government from altering the British preferential tariff at any time.

Metz Smallpox Outbreak.

MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can give any information about an alleged epidemic of smallpox at Metz which began last July, has assumed alarming proportions, has seriously affected trade and industry, and has caused the usual Eastertide festivities to be abandoned; can he say if the population at Metz is protected by vaccination and re-vaccination with the same thoroughness as the rest of the German empire; and, if he has not this information, will he send a special commission to inquire and report.

SIR EDWARD GREY: I have no information other than that supplied to me by the hon. Member. His Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin would, no doubt, ask the German authorities to facilitate any inquiry which competent British authorities may desire to make independently in the interests of medical science, but I have not been advised that the occasion is one which requires the appointment of a special commission by His Majesty's Government.

Duty on Cocoa.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the duty payable on raw cocoa is from 2s. 3d. to 8s. 6d. per cwt. less than the duty charged on the product of the same quantity of raw material if imported in a manufactured state.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifeshire, E.): An infinite number of combinations of cocoa with other ingredients may be made, and it is therefore impossible to state the exact amount of advantage which may be derived by a manufacturer in this country as compared with a foreign importer. The matter is a complicated one and cannot be dealt with within the limits of a Parliamentary Question and Answer; but, so far as the data which I have enables me to make a calculation, there is an advantage of about 2s. 3d. in favour of the home manufacturer of cocoa powder upon each hundredweight of cocoa beans dealt with, while, in the case of chocolate confectionery of various kinds, there is a similar and often greater advantage, which may, as regards some classes of goods, even reach the higher figure quoted. On the other hand, there is no drawback upon the export of cocoa manufactures.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will lay upon the Table the Report of the Chairman of the Board of Customs, dated 5th October, 1904, on the working of the cocoa and chocolate duties.

MR. ASQUITH: The Paper referred to is a confidential Memorandum prepared for Departmental purposes. I am not prepared to lay it on the Table.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that although the Paper is headed "Confidential" as is every Report by the Chairman of of the Board of Customs to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer was quite prepared to lay it on the Table if desired.

MR. ASQUITH: I think it would be a very bad precedent, and I do not intend to set it.

Imported Colonial Spirit.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether imported Colonial spirit for methylating is subject to an adverse differential treatment to the extent of 5d. as compared with Home spirit; and, if so, what is the reason for such differential treatment.

MR. ASQUITH: Colonial spirit, like all imported spirit, is subjected to a Customs Duty which exceeds the Excise Duty on British spirit by 4d. a gallon in the case of rum and brandy, and by 5d. in the case of other spirit. The reason for the difference between the Customs and Excise Duties is that the Excise Duty represents only a part of the total burden imposed on British spirit. It does not cover that portion of the burden which results from revenue restrictions on the manufacture of spirit, and, as this portion of the burden has to be borne by British spirit, whatever the purpose for which it may be used, equality of treatment requires that imported spirit should pay the difference between the two duties, whatever the purpose for which it may be used. Accordingly, imported spirit used for methylation is charged the difference, which on Colonial spirit would be 4d. in the case of rum or brandy, and 5d. in case of other spirit.

Duty on Tobacco.

MR. DAVID MACIVER (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the duty payable on unmanufactured tobacco is considerably less than the duty charged on the product of the same quantity of raw material if imported in a manufactured state as cigarettes or cigars.

MR. ASQUITH: Yes, Sir. It has always been held that cigars cannot be manufactured in this country to compete with foreign cigars, and that the additional duty is, therefore, not a protective duty, but a luxury tax. The principle was extended to cigarettes by my immediate predecessor as Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for East Worcestershire, who, if I remember rightly, argued the case for the extension upon purely free trade grounds.

MR. DAVID MACIVER: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, as regards the kind of tobacco ordinarily consumed by working men, the amount claimed by the Exchequer in respect of Customs Duty largely exceeds the value of the article; and whether, in the case of a threepenny packet of tobacco such as working men ordinarily smoke, the Customs Duty now collected amounts to about 2½d. the actual value of the tobacco being only about one halfpenny.

MR ASQUITH: Yes, Sir.

Anthrax.

MR. JOWETT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the fact that during the six months ending 20th March last there were fifty-four cases of anthrax reported to his office, fourteen of which were fatal, and that in eight of the fifty-four cases his officers have failed to ascertain the kind of material upon which the person attacked had been engaged, he can see his way to make such arrangements as will in future enable him to inform himself as to the materials which have carried the infection.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I understand the hon. Member refers to some statistics of anthrax with which I recently furnished him. In the eight cases in which a return was made of "material not ascertained," the reference intended was to the material by which the infection was actually conveyed, and not to the material on which the worker was engaged. It is sometimes impossible—especially in the case of miscellaneous occupations such as that of dock labourer, carter or the like, in which six out of the eight cases occurred—to trace the source of the infection; a mere entry of the material on which the worker had been engaged would not serve any useful purpose and might be actually misleading. Every effort, of course, is made by the Medical Inspector of Factories to trace the source of infection in each case, but it is difficult to see what further arrangements, especially in the case of miscellaneous employments such as those mentioned, can be made to ensure a knowledge of the particular material which has carried the infection. I should add that the figures quoted by the hon. Member refer to a period of nearly nine months, and not six as stated in the question.

MR. JOWETT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in regard to all future cases of anthrax which occur at seed-crushing, oil-extracting, and bag-making works, he will endeavour to ascertain the kind of material from which the bags used in seed-crushing and oil-extraction operations have been made and, in the case of bag-making works, what materials are being used.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir, this will be done.

Birmingham Betting Prosecution.

*CAPTAIN FABER (Hampshire, Andover): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that on Friday, 12th April, a soldier, by name Joseph Latham, on furlough from India, was arrested in Birmingham for handing two papers to a man, who was not a bookmaker but a greengrocer, and that this soldier was marched through the streets between two policemen, although he was in His Majesty's uniform; and will he state what reparation has been made, considering that the stipendiary dismissed the case.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am informed that Latham was found giving two packets containing money and names of horses to a well-known bookmaker whom the police were watching for the purpose of taking proceedings under the Street Betting Act of last session, and that he was thereupon arrested and charged under the Act. He was not in uniform at the time. The magistrate dismissed the charge on the ground that Latham was possibly an innocent agent. I see no reason to think that he has any claim to compensation.

Aliens.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can give the number of aliens who have arrived in this country in batches of nineteen or less, and have thus escaped examination, during the last six months; how many vessels have been concerned in bringing these people; and what is their classification according to nationality.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I am unable to give the information asked as regards the present year, as the statistics for the last three months are not yet fully tabulated. I have, however, extracted from the complete figures for 1906, which are being prepared for publication, those relating to the last six months of that year. They are as follows:—Between 1st July and 31st December, 1906, 4,894 non-immigrant ships—i.e., ships bringing not more than twenty alien steerage passengers—brought a total of 66,636 alien passengers. After deducting cabin and exempted second-class passengers and transmigrants, there remain 11,502 alien passengers brought on non-immigrant ships. Deducting further (1) those who stated they were proceeding to a destination outside the United Kingdom, (2) those who held return tickets to the Continent, and (3) seamen, there is a total of 6,567 alien passengers on non-immigrant ships who may be said to have escaped examination by arriving on such ships. The nationalities of the 6,567 aliens were as follows:—Russians and Poles, 2,266; French, 1,691; Germans, 773; Dutch, 336; Scandinavians, 299; Italians, 267; Austrians, 240; Spaniards, 206; Swiss, 140; Belgians, 133; United States, 64; others, 152.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any information that persons who have been rejected under the Aliens Act are brought into this country in small batches of nineteen or less; if not, whether he will cause inquiry to be made upon this subject; and whether any steps are taken to ascertain if persons rejected on account of contagious disease attempt to enter the country after rejection.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I have no information to the effect suggested in the first part of the Question: and as to the last two sentences I do not see what steps I can take in the direction indicated, as there is no power to inspect alien steerage passengers on non-immigrant ships.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state the number of aliens landed in Great Britain during the past twelve months, and the number of skilled artisans who have emigrated from Great Britain to foreign countries during the same period.

*MR. GLADSTONE: The total number of aliens who landed in the United Kingdom during the twelve months ended 31st December, 1906, was 560,368. This total includes aliens of every description, irrespective of the purposes for which they may have come to this country. The total number of skilled workmen recorded as leaving the United Kingdom during 1906 for non-European foreign countries was 38,600, of whom 23,245 were of British nationality. The number leaving for European countries cannot be stated.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Will the Government take steps to prevent the landing of these aliens to this enormous extent, and thus enable the British workman to find employment in his own country?

*MR. GLADSTONE referred the hon. Member to his previous Answer as throwing light on the figures last given.

*MAJOR SEELY asked if the right hon. Gentleman, in view of the extraordinarily small number of aliens permanently remaining in this country, the great cost of administering the Act, and the hardships imposed by it on refugees, would not consider the desirability of repealing the Act altogether?

Vaccination Exemption at Bradford.

MR. LUPTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the case of Mr. Vincent Ward, an applicant for a vaccination exemption certificate at the West Riding Court, Bradford, when Dr. W. H. Ellis, a local practitioner, presided, and refused the application; if it is permissible for a medical practitioner to adjudicate in these cases; if his attention has been called to the statement of Mr. Rawson, the magistrate's clerk, that the question was whether vaccination would injure the child; and if he will take steps to remove Mr. Rawson.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am making inquiry into this case, and I will let the hon. Member know the result, but I may point out that I have, of course, no control over a magistrate's clerk.

Poor Prisoners Defence Act.

MR. RENDALL (Gloucestershire, Thornbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has, as promised, communicated with Mr. Wallace, K.C. the Chairman of the London County Sessions, with regard to the latter's expression of opinion that the Poor Prisoners' Defence Act was rendered practically inoperative because legal aid could not be granted unless a prisoner disclosed a defence before the committing magistrate; and what reply the Chairman has given to his communication.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have consulted Mr. Wallace, and have received from him a suggestion for the Amendment of the Rules under the Act. I will bring his proposal to the notice of the Attorney-General by whom the Rules are made.

Company Subscriptions to Election Funds.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that the dock companies assisted in financing the London Municipal Society; whether he will make an inquiry into the extent and circumstances of the subscription; and whether he will take any steps, by legislation or otherwise, to prevent the recurrence of subscriptions by companies created by Act of Parliament to associations which take an active part in contested elections.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): I have been in communication with the London and India Docks Company, the Surrey Commercial Dock Company, and the Millwall Dock Company on the subject of my hon. friend's Question. I have received replies from these companies to the effect that they have subscribed, the London and India Docks Company, £100, the Surrey Commercial Dock Company, £100, and the Millwall Dock Company, £21, to the funds of the London Municipal Society. These replies, which are too lengthy for me to read here, but which will be printed with the Votes, state in all three cases, that the Directors were not influenced by any political motive.

"London and India Docks Company,
"Dock House, 109, Leadenhall Street,
"London, 18th April, 1907.
H. 4547.

"Sir,

"The Directors have had before them your letter of the 12th instant. They have no objection to stating that they subscribed £100 to the funds of the London Municipal Society in December last, and they are advised that under the judgment given by the Court of Appeal on the 19th November, 1906, the contribution was a perfectly legal one.

"Their reason for giving the subscription was to aid the endeavours of the London Municipal Society to return members at the recent municipal and guardian elections pledged to economy in local administration.

"The Company, like all proprietors of industrial undertakings in and near London, have suffered grievously from the excessive local rates levied upon them. Rates have been increasing for many years past, and there has been no remedy open to the Company in the municipality itself, for although they pay a large proportion of the rates in every locality in which their docks are situated, they have absolutely no voice in the election of the persons who spend their money.

"The only course open to the Company, therefore, is to support reputable organisations which are found to educate voters as to the peril to them of the increase of municipal burdens, and to expose the mismanagement of particular local institutions. Acting on this principle, my directors have subscribed to the West Ham Borough Alliance and the Poplar Borough Alliance. Both of these alliances have been remarkably successful in the work, and it may be within the knowledge of the Board of Trade that they have been active agents in bringing to light the notorious scandals which have been the subject of recent official inquiry in these two boroughs: indeed in the case of the inquiry into the administration of the Poor Law at Poplar, the alliance was officially recognised by the Local Government Board's representative as the body chiefly responsible for proving the charges made against the guardians. In Poplar alone, as a result of the action taken by the alliance, there will be savings in expenditure at the rate of £70,000 a year, which will be shared by the whole of the ratepayers of the borough.

"It was because of the success achieved at Poplar and West Ham that the Directors welcomed the efforts of the London Municipal Society to apply to those matters in which London as a whole is concerned, the same reforming energy which has been applied locally at Poplar and West Ham.

"The Directors observe that it has been charged against the London Municipal Society that it is a political organisation. No ground for such a charge is to be found either in the rules or the statement of objects of the society. No political test for membership is imposed, and as a fact, there are persons belonging to both the Unionist and Liberal Parties amongst its members, and on the council is Sir F. Schuster, who was the Liberal candidate for the City of London at the last general election.

"The Directors, amongt whom are adherents of both sides of politics, would certainly not continue their support to the society if they had any reason to believe that its aims were political, but no evidence has come before them to show that there has been any conduct on the part of its managers which indicates a departure from the spirit of its constitution.

"London, E.C.,

"Sir,

"I have submitted to my directors your letter of the 12th instant, and, in reply to your enquiry as to whether or not my company have made any subscription to the London Municipal Society, I am instructed to state that in November last my company subscribed the sum of £100 to the funds of the Society.

"In making this contribution my directors were not influenced by any political considerations. They were solely concerned, in the interests of their shareholders, to ensure the election of persons pledged to the economical administration of local affairs, with a view to obtaining some alleviation of the burden of excessive and increasing rates from which my company, in common with other industrial undertakings, has suffered severely.

"Whilst this company contribute a very large proportion of the rates in the district in which their property is situated, they have no part in the election of the members of the bodies who make the rates, and have absolutely no control over the expenditure.

"In these circumstances my directors, believing the London Municipal Society to be a non-political organisation, as evidenced by its constitution rules and membership, thought it right to support the society, whose objects appeared to them legitimate and desirable.

"Millwall Dock Company,
"Dock House, 1, Railway Place,
"Fenchurch Street, E.C.,

"Sir,

"In reply to your letter of the 12th instant, I am instructed to say that a donation of twenty guineas has been given to the funds of the London Municipal Society by this company.

"In response to your invitation to offer observations on the subject, I am further instructed by my directors (who represent both shades of political opinion) to say that they were induced to make this donation by the success which attended their efforts to expose the wasteful and extravagant policy of the Guardians in Poplar, through the medium of the Popular Borough Municipal Alliance, to whose funds an amount of £125 has been contributed from time to time by my Board.

"My directors had noted with apprehension the steady growth in the Poplar general rates, as shown in the following table:—

1899 - -	8s. 7½d.	,,
1901 - -	9s. 4d.	,,
1902 - -	9s. 7d.	,,
1903 - -	9s. 8d.	,,
1905 - -	11s. 8d.	,,
1907 at the rate of	10s. 7d.	,,

after the Poplar Inquiry.

"My directors were unable to secure any redress from the burden, as they had no voice whatever in the disposition of the funds to which they were large contributors, until the Poplar Borough Municipal Alliance secured the assistance of the Local Government Board, who held an inquiry into the expenditure and operations of the Guardians at Poplar with the result shown above in 1907.

"My directors are fully satisfied that in helping to promote this public inquiry they were acting in the interests of their proprietors and of the general body of ratepayers in the borough of Poplar.

"Encouraged by the distinct benefits which resulted from the efforts of the Poplar alliance my directors had no hesitation in contributing to the funds of the London Municipal Society, and did so in the hope and belief that the society would direct its efforts to putting a stop to the heavy expenditure of municipal bodies who, in the opinion of my directors, do not sufficiently take into consideration the burden that is being placed upon public and other companies through their extravagance.

"I am further desired to say that my directors take strong exception to the suggestions which have been publicly advanced that such monies have been contributed for political purposes; their one and only object has been to effectually counteract the alarming tendency in recent years to increase the local rates.

AN HON. MEMBER suggested that the right hon. Gentleman should inquire into the action of the Glasgow Corporation in spending the ratepayers' money in promoting the Land Taxation Bill.

Coal Export.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total quantity of coal exported from the United Kingdom in 1906, including the estimated coal equivalent of coke and patent fuel.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The total quantity was 76,788,179 tons, if bunker coal is included. Excluding bunker coal the total was 58,197,966 tons.

Export Returns.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the incompleteness of the figures relating to exported manufactures in the Returns of Imperial trade given in the Statistical Abstract; why leather goods are represented in that Return as the solitary manufactured export of the British Empire; and whether he will take steps to complete the statement in future issues by the inclusion of figures relating to other manufactured commodities.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The table in the British Empire Abstract to which the right hon. Member alludes was originally intended to show the trade in certain staple foodstuffs and raw materials between the British Empire as a whole and foreign countries. The classification introduced in the most recent issue of the abstract under the three headings, food, raw materials, and manufactured articles, has had the unintended effect of giving a solitary position to leather in this table which, I admit, now gives a misleading impression. I shall be very glad to discuss with the right hon. Gentleman how far it is practicable to include particulars with regard to a few of the more important groups of manufactured articles, having due regard to the great labour involved in compiling the details and the want of uniformity in the Colonial trade accounts.

Commercial Corruption.

MR. J. M. HENDERSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, consequent upon the provisions of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1906, and the action of various trade associations in making public the provisions thereof, offers of secret commission to agents are now being extensively circulated in this country from firms writing from abroad, the offer in some cases amounting to a very large percentage on the amount of the order sent to the foreign firms in question; and whether he will give the matter his attention at the earliest possible opportunity.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: My attention has already been called to this matter and a notice was published in the Board of Trade Journal for 21st February last in which it was pointed out that the acceptance of any such offers from foreign firms renders agents in this country liable to penalties under the Act. I trust that the efforts which I understand are being made by various associations of British traders to put an end to the practice, will be successful.

Patent Law.

MR. MOND (Chester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state whether Clause 10 of the Bill to amend the Law relating to Patents and Designs is at variance with any treaty, agreement, or engagement with any foreign country or British Possession; and, if so, what foreign countries or British Possessions.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am advised that the provisions of the clause would not be at variance with any existing, treaty, agreement, or arrangement.

North Eastern Signal Boxes at Hull.

Mr. HUDSON (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that the hours of duty of the gate signalmen at the St. George's road and Hawthorne avenue level crossings, Hull, North Eastern Railway, are at present six turns of twelve hours' day duty and seven turns of twelve hours' night duty per fortnight, without any clear Sunday off duty; whether any inquiry has been made under the Hours Act, 1893; and, if so, can he say what conclusion has been arrived at.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: Inquiry has been made in this matter, and the railway company have arranged that the gatemen concerned are to have a clear interval of twenty-four hours off duty on alternate Sundays.

Emigration.

Captain FABER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, looking at the fact that the Emigration Returns for Great Britain, which is a free trade country, amounted to 453,000 in 1904, and in Germany, which is protectionist, to only 28,000, and also looking at the destitution which exists at Woolwich owing to want of work, the Government can see their way to legislation which will safeguard our manufacturing industries, and so give more employment to those who wish for it.

The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. John Burns, Battersea): The figures mentioned in the Question do not seem to be comparable, for whilst those relating to the United Kingdom represent the total number of passengers leaving this country for places out of Europe in 1904, and include foreign passengers and also British and Irish passengers, whether emigrants or not, the figures relating to Germany appear only to include such Germans as can be stated to be leaving for settlement abroad. The promotion of the legislation which would be necessary to give effect to the suggestion in the last part of the Question would not be a matter within the province of my Department, but I should have thought that the views of the present Government on the subject of any legislation having protection for its object were sufficiently well known.

Captain FABER: Has the right hon. Gentleman no remedy to suggest?

Mr. JOHN BURNS: There are many remedies suggested for the unemployed difficulty, but the most unsatisfactory is protection.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman give us the figures for England which are comparable to the 28,000 for Germany?

Mr. JOHN BURNS: If the right hon. Gentleman will give me notice, I shall be pleased to get the best available figures.

Sir GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Is it not the case that the emigrants for England number 34 per 10,000, and for Germany only 9 per 10,000.

Mr. JOHN BURNS said he was not disposed to accept those Returns. There were many other things to be taken into account.

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): Has the right hon. Gentleman any figures showing the ratio to population?

Derby Union and Vaccination.

Mr. BELL (Derby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether he is aware that Dr. Johnson, one of the Local Government Board inspectors, has instructed the vaccination officer of the Derby Union to recommence prosecutions under the Vaccination Acts; whether he is aware that there are between 25,000 and 30,000 children unvaccinated in Derby, and if the parents of all those will also be prosecuted, and, if so, will those of the longest standing be proceeded against first and continued on in that order; and whether Dr. Johnson's action has the sanction of the Local Government Board.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: A new vaccination officer has recently been appointed at Derby, and Dr. Johnson acted properly in advising him as to his duties, one of which is to take all reasonable steps to put the Vaccination Acts in force. I am aware that there are a large number of unvaccinated children in Derby. It is not contemplated that proceedings will have to be taken in all these cases. I understand that Dr. Johnson told the vaccination officer that he should use all possible means of persuasion to induce parents to comply with the law, and that if this failed, he should institute proceedings in a limited number of cases with a view to securing its observance. The selection of the cases would rest with the vaccination officer.

Poor Law Expenditure.

Mr. WALROND (Devonshire, Tiverton): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what is the total expenditure incurred by all local bodies, excluding that on Poor Law, for the financial year 1906, or for the financial year 1905 if the figures for the former year are not available.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: The figures for the financial year 1904–5 are not quite ready. Those for the year 1903–4 show that the total expenditure of all the local authorities in England and Wales, excluding expenditure on the relief of the poor and purposes connected therewith, was £114,573,229, inclusive of £29,407,543 defrayed out of loans.

Mr. WALROND: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what is the total number of municipal officers and employees of all grades, excluding Poor Law, and the total amount of salaries, wages, gratuities, etc., received by these for the year 1906, or for 1905 if the figures for the former year are not available.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: The Returns furnished to the Local Government Board do not give the information desired by the hon. Member. A Parliamentary Return will, however, shortly be published, showing the number of persons employed in November last by the London County Council and by the councils of County Boroughs and Metropolitan Boroughs. The remuneration of the persons employed by local authorities is often merged in the Returns in the expenditure on the purposes and undertakings in which the persons have been engaged; but the Local Taxation Returns give some particulars as to the salaries and superannuation allowances of the officers of local authorities, and I will send the hon. Member a copy of the last published summary of these Returns.

Death from Vaccination at Harringay.

*Mr. LUPTON: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if W. F. Hunt, of 64, Duckett Road, Harringay, has complained to the Local Government Board that his child, Olive Hunt, has died from the effects of vaccination, and has applied to the Local Government Board, in a letter dated 18th February, 1907, to be allowed to see a copy of the Report of the case prepared by Dr. Fletcher for the Local Government Board; and if he will order a copy of the Report to be supplied to Mr. Hunt.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: I received the letter referred to, but, as I stated in reply to a previous Question on this subject by my hon. friend, the Report of Dr. Fletcher was made for my information and is a confidential document. Consequently I could not supply a copy to Mr. Hunt.

*Mr. LUPTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to make a copy?

Mr. JOHN BURNS: Certainly not.

*Mr. LUPTON: Why is it when the quality of the staff which he supplies is impugned he keeps the reports secret?

Indian Mail Contracts.

Sir H. COTTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether a new postal contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company is under consideration; and, if so, whether an accelerated despatch can be arranged for under which the Indian mail will ordinarily arrive in London not later than Friday morning.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The question of future arrangements for the Eastern mail service is under consideration; but I am not at present in a position to make any announcement on the subject.

Education Bill.

LORD EDMUND TALBOT (Sussex, Chichester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education when he will introduce the Bill to authorise the expenditure of public money upon the erection of new public elementary schools.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The form which this legislation will take is still under consideration, and I am not in a position to say when it will be introduced.

Royston Head Teachership.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether the grounds given by the West Riding education authority for their refusal to appoint Mr. Milnes to the head teachership of the Royston school are entirely based upon a report by the sub-committee; whether he is aware that the sub-committee consisted of two members with their clerk, not specially experienced in dealing with children or in testing the efficiency of teachers; that the total duration of their visit to Sharlston school was forty-five minutes, of which not more than fifteen were spent with the children in the school, and that not more than six questions in geography and mental arithmetic were asked of the children; and whether he will see that evidence based on such a visit of inspection shall not be allowed by the Board to outweigh the favourable reports of many Government Inspectors extending over many years, and the strong recommendation of Mr. Milne's appointment made by the Inspector specially sent by the Board to inquire into this dispute.

MR. MCKENNA: I am unable to say whether the local education authority's decision was entirely based on the sub-committee's report, but as the sub-committee appointed representatives with the special object of visiting the school at which Mr. Milnes is employed, I have no doubt considerable weight was given to their report. According to my information the sub-committee did not consist of two members and their clerk, as stated by the hon. Gentleman. Two members of the sub-committee, accompanied by the county council's inspector of schools, visited the school in question. I am informed that at least forty-five minutes was spent with the children themselves, besides the fifteen or twenty minutes spent in the school in discussion with the head master before the children assembled; I have no information as to the number of questions asked. As I have previously stated, the jurisdiction of the Board in these cases is strictly limited to deciding whether the local education authority withheld their consent on educational grounds and no question of one report outweighing another can therefore arise.

MR. LANE-FOX: Arising out of that Answer may I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention has been drawn to the letter written by the chairman of this education committee, and appearing in the Yorkshire Post on Monday last, and whether that letter is consistent with the statement that the appointment of Mr. Milnes was refused on educational grounds?

MR. MCKENNA: Yes, Sir. My attention has been called to that letter, and it appears to me that the strict construction of that letter does not agree with the statement made by the local education authority.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman conceives that the duty of the Education Department is fulfilled the moment it receives the statement of the local education authority that they had acted on educational grounds, or whether he considers they ought to ascertain whether that statement correctly represents the facts?

MR. MCKENNA: I do think it is the duty of the Board of Education to inquire whether the statement does correctly represent the facts.

*MR. GEORGE FABER (York): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is still prepared to repeat the Answer given in the House last week that there was no shadow of doubt that the appointment was refused on educational grounds?

Mr. McKENNA: I have no doubt the educational authority refused the appointment on educational grounds.

Non-Provided Schools.

Lord R. CECIL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education how many of the local education authorities in any of the years 1904, 1905, and 1906 spent on the non-provided schools in their districts not more than the amounts received by way of grants in respect of such schools.

Mr. McKENNA: I have no information as to the sums spent by local education authorities upon individual schools, and, as I stated, in answer to my hon. friend the Member for Merthyr Tydvil, on Monday. separate accounts for the whole cost of individual schools, so far as I am aware, are not usually kept.

Lord R. CECIL: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman obtain information, not in respect of individual schools, but in respect of the whole body of non-provided schools in each district?

Mr. McKENNA: No, Sir, I am not able to do that.

Lord R. CECIL: Can it not be obtained by means of a circular from the Education Department?

Mr. McKENNA: No, Sir, we have no authority to demand such information from the local authorities. In fact they do not keep their account in such a way as to admit of their giving it.

Pall Mall Improvement.

Sir F. BANBURY (City of London): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what sums are now being expended upon the repair and redecoration of the buildings in Pall Mall recently occupied by the War Office.

The FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. Harcourt, Lancashire, Rossendale): I have been asked to reply to this Question. One portion of these buildings will be occupied for the present by the staff of the Director of Barrack Construction, for which there is no accommodation in the new War Office. A sum of £700 has been expended on work for this occupation. Another portion will temporarily be used by the Office of Woods during the building of new offices for that Department; but the cost of preparation cannot yet be given. The remainder of the old War Office premises in this block has reverted to the Land Revenue as Crown property at the disposal of the Office of Woods; and nothing has been expended on it on repair or redecoration since it was vacated.

Grand Committee Rooms.

Mr. NIELD: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works which rooms are to be allocated for the use of Grand Committees in addition to the large Committee room now used for that purpose; and what alterations are to be made for the convenience of the Press, the public, and the Members serving upon the Committees.

Mr. HARCOURT: The large Committee room off Westminster Hall will be available, and I am considering improvements in its seating accommodation.

Vote on Account of Provision for New Schools.

Lord BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury on what date it was decided to exclude from the Vote on Account the proportion of the sum of £100,000 to be voted as special provision for new schools.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Runciman, Dewsbury): No special decision was necessary, as it would be contrary to the rules governing Votes on Account to include therein any provision for a new service.

Prescot Land Tax Commissioners.

Mr. AUSTIN TAYLOR (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that the Land Tax Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1906 for the Prescot district of the county of Lancaster were summoned to attend a meeting at Prescot on the 11th instant to appoint the collectors for the ensuing year; that twenty-five gentlemen from Liverpool accordingly attended at the hour named; that on arrival they were informed by the clerk that there was no business to transact; and that two meetings had been held previously in March and April at which the clerk himself and the collectors were appointed, and to which the Land Tax Commissioners in question were never summoned; whether these meetings and the business transacted thereat are valid; and what steps His Majesty's Government intend to take to secure the proper working of the Act of 1906 and the due summoning of the Land Tax Commissioners as prescribed by that Act.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The incident referred to appears to have been due to some misapprehension on the part of the clerk. I understand that another meeting has now been held at which satisfactory explanations were given and an amicable settlement of the difficulty effected.

Second Class Inspectors of Inland Revenue.

MR. SNOWDEN (Blackburn): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, can he say how many examinations have been held since 1st January, 1897, of supervisors of Inland Revenue, for the position of second-class inspectors of Inland Revenue; the dates on which the several examinations were held; the number of supervisors summoned to attend each examination; the number who actually attended; and the number passed at each examination.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The Answer to this Question involves a great number of figures which, however, I can communicate privately to the hon. Member if he desires.

Population, Revenue, and Expenditure.

MR. ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will cause to be issued a similar memorandum respecting the progress of population, revenue and expenditure, to that contained in Parliamentary Paper, No. 163, of Session 1896, bringing the figures down to 31st March, 1907, and excluding, if needs be, the figures for the years of war taxation and expenditure, which, to a certain extent, vitiate comparisons.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The Memorandum to which my hon. friend refers contains a great mass of detail, much of which would not now probably have any very great general interest, but I will consider whether a simpler statement can be prepared embracing the more important points, and bringing the information down to the present time.

Export of Horses to the Continent.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if it has been possible for the Department to act upon any of the suggestions of the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals as detailed by the deputation thereof, received upon 15th January 1907, in the matter of the export trade to the Continent of old and decrepit British horses, so as to minimise as far as possible the suffering and cruelty involved in the traffic.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): The suggestions made are receiving careful attention, and we have called for reports on the subject from our inspectors, but I am not in a position at present to make any further statement in the matter.

Anthrax.

MR. JOWETT: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether, on all future occasions when an outbreak of anthrax among cattle is reported, he will inquire whether oil cake has been used in feeding the infected cattle; and, if so, whether bags made from dangerous wool have been utilised at any stage in the manufacture of such oil cake, and, also, where bags of the description referred to have been used, the kind of material from which the bags have been manufactured.

SIR EDWARD STRACHEY: It is already our practice, when anthrax is reported, to ascertain whether artificial feeding stuffs, including oil cake, have been used. Where necessary, samples of the feeding stuff, and of the bags in which it is contained are taken for experimental investigation. Up to the present, infection has not been definitely traced in any case to the material of which the bags are made.

Dumbarton Sewerage.

Mr. R. DUNCAN (Govan): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the Local Government Board in effect ordered the conversion of the domestic sanitary system of the burgh of Dumbarton, as stated by the Provost before a Parliamentary Committee on 8th May, 1906; whether he is aware that the conversion referred to has resulted in the domestic sewage of over 20,000 inhabitants being discharged into the tidal pools of the River Leven without purification of any kind; and whether, in view of the condition of the river, he will insist upon such proceedings being taken as will render the conversion of the sewage system harmless to the natural purity of the river.

The SECRETARY for SCOTLAND (Mr. Sinclair, Forfarshire): In 1903 the Local Government Board pressed the local authority to take steps to remove certain nuisances. I understand that the local authority have also on hand the extension of all outlets into the river so as to prevent the deposit of sewage on the shores above low water mark. When these have been completed it is believed that a great improvement will be effected in the condition of the river bed.

Mr. R. DUNCAN: Is the Government aware, as a reason for pressing action in this matter, that the City of Glasgow is expending about £2,000,000 sterling for the purification of the River Clyde, and that the neglect of the purification of the River Leven may render this expense nugatory?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am aware of that.

British Fishermen on Foreign Trawlers.

Mr. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he is aware that a number of Grimsby fishermen have been summoned to appear at Elgin; that such prosecution has been instituted by the Scottish Fishery Board for alleged contravention of the local Scottish fishery regulations in vogue in the Moray Firth; and, if so, whether he is aware that these men occupied subordinate positions on board of the trawlers and took service on board with the sole desire of earning an honest livelihood, and that it has always been recognised by them that, being engaged on these boats with a captain superior to them, they were amply protected from interference under the Scottish regulations, and that the vessels on which the defendants were engaged were none of them within the three mile limit, some of them being from ten to twelve miles from low-water mark; and whether, in view of all these circumstances, he will use his best endeavours to have such prosecution set aside.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The facts regarding intended prosecutions are as stated by the hon. Member. The policy of the Government to proceed against British subjects engaged in illegal trawling has been already intimated to the House, and I am unable to adopt the course suggested in the Question.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): May I ask if the right hon. Gentleman knows that the men mentioned in the Question were heavily fined for being employed on foreign trawlers?

Mr. SINCLAIR: They were fined, not for being found on foreign trawlers, but for breaking the laws of their own country.

Sir GEORGE DOUGHTY (Great Grimsby): Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the persons fined yesterday were employed on foreign trawlers?

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is so, and the responsibility rests with those who employed them.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON: May I ask whether it is the intention of the Government to allow English fishermen to be heavily fined and imprisoned for doing what foreign fishermen have the right to do?

The PRIME MINISTER and FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Stirling Burghs): The intention of the Government is to compel obedience to the law.

SIR GEORGE DOUGHTY: Is it an illegal act for an Englishman to serve on a foreign ship?

SIR. H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not think it is, but it is an illegal act for him to go into the Moray Firth and break the law of Scotland.

SIR GEORGE DOUGHTY: But foreign trawlers are doing that daily, and these men are employed on foreign trawlers.

MR. STANLEY WILSON: May I ask if the House is to understand that the Government is in favour of giving preference to foreign over English fishermen?

Irish Board of Works.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the statement made from the bench by the chief magistrate of the city of Dublin as to the character of the Board of Works, which was not refuted by the Board, will he ask the Board of Works why this matter was allowed to pass unnoticed, having regard to their minute dealing with the article in the Freeman's Journal of the 16th November last, relative to their incompetency and the bigotry of Mr. Williams.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The Board of Works inform me that they have no knowledge of the statement alleged to have been made by the chief magistrate of the city of Dublin as to the character of the Board of Works. In any case it is not the custom of Government Departments to reply to attacks made on them by outside bodies, or individuals, but it is within their discretion to take such steps as may appear necessary to maintain the discipline of their Department.

Carrickfergus Town Lands.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that certain landowners at Carrickfergus, county Antrim, are endeavouring to arrange the purchase of the head-rents paid to the town Commissioners of Carrickfergus; whether he is aware that these lands were vested by Royal Charter from Queen Elizabeth in the town commissioners, and were inalienable; that under the Charter the occupiers or leaseholders cannot lease, let, or sell the lands without the sanction of the council; and whether inquiries will be made to ascertain if these are Crown lands or municipal or private property.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHERRY, Liverpool Exchange): I am informed by the town clerk of Carrickfergus that one application only has been received from a landowner at Carrickfergus for the purchase of head-rents payable to the town commissioners. The offer was ultimately refused. The lands are vested in the town commissioners by Royal Charter of Queen Elizabeth confirmed by Charters of 7th James I. and 10th James I., but I understand the Charters contain no restriction upon alienation. The former corporation made grants for ever, and leases for long terms of years which did contain clauses restricting alienation, but the urban district council in whom the lands are now vested have been advised by counsel that such clauses when contained in fee-farm grants are inoperative and void. They are, I believe, valid when contained in leases for terms of years, except so far as they are affected by the terms of the Land Act, 1903. I do not see any necessity for an inquiry into the matter, as it has not been suggested that the town commissioners are in any way acting contrary to their duties towards the public.

Irish Post Office Stores Department.

MR. MEAGHER (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether it is contemplated to establish a branch of the Controller of Stores Department in Dublin; and, if so, whether the existing storesmen and stores clerks at the local depôts in Cork, Belfast, and Dublin will have the option of being transferred to the new branch as they desire, or is it the intention to import a staff from Great Britain and appoint an Englishman to the control of the new branch at Dublin, in accordance with the usual practice of the Post Office in Ireland nowadays?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: At present the officers in charge of postal stores in Ireland are under the control of the Secretary in Dublin, and those in charge of telegraph stores are officers of the engineer-in-chief in London. It is intended, on the ground of administrative convenience, to unite the two branches and to place the stores department in Dublin under the control of the Controller of Stores. The details of the rearrangement have not yet been settled, but due regard will be had to the claims of the existing staff.

Welsh Church Commission.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been called to the fact that several members of the Welsh Church Commission have ceased to attend the meetings of that body; whether any member has tendered his resignation; and if he can give an assurance that neither the resignation of members nor the differences that have arisen between members as to the meaning and scope of the reference will delay the Report of the Commission, or postpone the introduction of the promised Disestablishment Bill next session.

MR. REES: I beg at the same time to ask the Prime Minister whether any member or members of the Welsh Church Commission have resigned; and whether any steps can be taken to hasten the proceedings of this Commission, in view of the unanimity of Welsh constituencies upon the subject with which the Commission has to deal.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am sorry to say that my hon. friend the Member for Mid-Glamorganshire, together with Professor Jones and Principal Fairbairn have tendered their resignation to the King. I can, of course, give no assurance as to the progress which will be made by a body over which I have no control. But I have no fear that any unnecessary delay will occur.

Irish Licensing Trade.

MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if he is aware that Ireland, with a population slightly and wealth largely below that of Scotland, has about 7,000 more public houses; that, owing to the decision in Clitheroe's case, the justices in Ireland have no power to refuse renewals of licences on the ground of there being too many public houses, and that the Licensing Act of 1904 does not apply to Ireland; and will he consider the desirability of immediate legislation on the subject to meet the need of Ireland for reduction of the number of her licensed houses.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The facts as stated in the hon. Member's Question are, I believe, substantially correct. With regard to the last paragraph of the Question I would refer the hon. Member to an Answer I gave him upon this subject on Wednesday last.†

Loans for School Buildings.

MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of representations that have been made to the Local Government Board in favour of granting longer terms for the repayment of loans contracted by municipal and other authorities for the erection of school buildings, he will arrange for the Local Government Board Vote being taken first on some early Thursday.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANERNMAN: I will communicate with my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board, but I understand that there are difficulties in the way of taking this Vote on an early Thursday.

Standing Order 18.

MR. NIELD: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, having regard to the amount of work which, under the proposed amendment of the Standing Orders, will devolve upon the Standing Committees, he will consider the advisability of amending the Standing Order No. 18 so as to apply its provisions, either wholly or in some modified form, to proceedings before such Committees.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I hardly see the connection between the work that will be done by the Standing Committees and the unruly conduct of Members which the hon. Member anticipates. I should have thought that the more work they had to do the less unruly they would be. Should the necessity unhappily arise, I should, however, be prepared to consider the hon. Member's suggestion, but the Standing Order to which he refers is not a very convenient weapon seeing that it broke in the hand of the Minister who was forging it and has remained ever since in a truncated condition.

Empire Day.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether His Majesty's Government will favourably consider the advisability of ordering the British flag to be hoisted where possible on all Government buildings throughout Great Britain on future Empire days.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have already given this matter my consideration, and I do not think it advisable that any order should be issued with regard to the hoisting of flags on Government buildings on the day in question.

CAPTAIN CRAIG asked if there was any objection to the hoisting of the flag on Government buildings on Empire day.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.): What is Empire day? How long has it been established?

Woolwich Arsenal Discharges.

CAPTAIN CRAIG: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the distress caused by the discharges from Woolwich Arsenal and Dockyard among the working classes and shopkeepers, he will arrange to take Vote 8, Ordnance Establishment, before the end of this month, so as to afford an opportunity to the House of discussing the whole matter before any further discharges take place.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that the consideration of this Vote would afford no opportunity for discussing the question of these discharges; but in any case the causes of the reduction of the Arsenal Staff are so well known that it seems to me doubtful whether a discussion would be of any benefit. As my right hon. friend the Secretary for War, has informed the House, they are due to general reductions in naval and military expenditure and not to any unusual allocation of Government orders, and everything that legitimately can be done will be done to temper the hardship which they entail.

Indian Budget.

DR. RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will allot two days to the discussion of the Indian Budget in order to enable the Secretary of State for India to reply to the criticisms and suggestions of hon. Members.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am afraid that in view of the amount of work which has to be got through it may be quite impossible to give more than one full day to the Indian Budget.

MR. REES: Will the right hon. Gentleman give us a full instead of a half day as before?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I will do my best.

Malta.

SIR F. BANBURY (City of London): I beg to ask the Prime Minister if it is proposed to appoint a civil governor for Malta; and by what department the appointment will be made.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is not proposed to alter the present arrangements by which the Governor of Malta is appointed.

The Government and the Lords.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will, before Whitsuntide, make an announcement to the House on the subject of the unfortunate differences which have arisen between the two Houses, mentioned in His Majesty's most Gracious Speech.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I hope so, Sir, but I shall be better able to answer the Question in a week's time.

Grand Committees.

MR. STANLEY WILSON: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to have official reports made of all proceedings taking place on the four new Grand Committees, and having such reports published for the use and benefit of all Members of the House.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Official Reports in the case of the Proceedings of the House itself, as well as of the Standing Committees, are confined to what is done and do not extend to what is spoken. We do not contemplate any alteration of this practice.

MR. STANLEY WILSON: How will Members of this House be able to gain information as to what takes place upstairs?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In the way they have done in past years.

Chamber of Commerce and the Colonial Premiers.

MR. FELL: I beg to ask the Prime Minister if his attention has been called to the resolution passed on the 15th March by the Glasgow Chamber of Commerce to send cordial greetings to the Colonial Premiers and to express the opinion that commercial union throughout the Empire could be most readily and advantageously established on a mutual preferential basis; and whether this resolution, and the other similar resolutions by these chambers, which represent the commerce of the country, will be specially considered by the Government.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: All expressions of public opinion that may reach His Majesty's Government will be duly considered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN stated that the business next week would be, provisionally, the Budget Resolutions on Money, the Army Bill on Tuesday, and the Budget Resolutions or Bill on Wednesday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): I take it the right hon. Gentleman proposes to follow the ordinary course tonight, and to restrict the Resolutions taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to those necessary for the public service, reserving the general discussion till a later day.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The ordinary practice will be followed.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

SIR WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Members from the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures: Mr. Everett and Mr. William Johnson; and had appointed in substitution: Mr. Lupton and Mr. John Johnson.

WAYS AND MEANS (COMMITTEE).

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

THE BUDGET STATEMENT.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): Mr. Emmott, as I am afraid I may have to make a somewhat considerable draft on the patience of the Committee in dealing with the present and the future, I shall content myself, and I will ask the Committee to be content, with a very brief, though, I hope, not wholly perfunctory, review of the past. The financial year which closed on March 31st was, in many ways, a remarkable one. Tried by all the ordinary tests, the trade of the United Kingdom, both at Home and over the sea, has rarely been more active or more flourishing. Nor was this prosperity confined to ourselves. It was shared, in greater or less degree, by almost all the producing countries of the world. To these generally favourable conditions there has been one prominent exception, the market for stocks and securities. Owing to causes of which I shall have to speak later on, there has been, especially in the later part of the year, a monetary stringency which looked at one time as though it were going to put a severe strain on the machinery of credit. It has been, from the financial point of view, in many ways, a year of surprises; and, perhaps, there has been nothing in it, superficially at least, more surprising than that the balance to the credit of the national account, which a year ago I estimated as likely to be somewhere between £300,000 and £400,000, was found, when the account was closed on March 31st, to be no less than £5,399,000. I have been the object of much misdirected congratulation in regard to the unforeseen dimensions of this enormous sum by people who do not understand the vital difference to the Chancellor of the Exchequer between the realised balance of one year and the estimated surplus of the next. Over the former, the realised balance of the past year, unless he chooses to ask Parliament to suspend the law, he has absolutely no control. It goes automatically to the Old Sinking Fund, and can only be legally applied to the redemption of debt; and as, moreover, any substantial excess in the realised over the estimated value is, or ought to be, the result of more or less accidental circumstances, its abnormal proportions afford little or no ground for anticipating a similar result in the coming year.

RESULTS OF PAST YEAR.

My first duty to-day is to explain how it is that a balance so largely beyond my expectations has been obtained. On the one hand, the Exchequer receipts were more than I expected by £2,059,000. On the other hand, the Exchequer issues were less than I expected by £3,006,000. These two items, added to the £334,000 which I allowed as a margin for the year, bring up the total I mentioned a moment ago to £5,399,000. Hon. Members will see from the statement in their hands that the large decrease on the expenditure side was entirely due to savings by the spending departments and mainly in the Army. The actual savings on the estimated expenditure of 1905–6, the year (for which we were not responsible) which had not been anticipated by March 31st, 1906, were £881,000, and the actual savings on the estimated expenditure for 1906–7, which were anticipated by the close of the financial year, and in respect of which no issues were made, were £1,150,000, making together for the Army a total of £2,031,000. On the revenue side the increase is due almost entirely to three items, in no one of which could its extent have been reasonably foreseen. The first of these comes under Customs; the coal duty, which during the last seven months of its life, April to November, produced £1,495,000, or £345,000 above the estimate, which was based on the highest yield of previous years. That was due to a time of very exceptional activity in the coal export trade, which was stimulated to some extent by strikes and by a shortage of supply in the French and German markets. The second item is the estate duties, which, in consequence of the falling in of a number of abnormally large estates, produced a record yield of nearly £1,200,000 in excess of the estimate. The third item, coming under the heading of "Miscellaneous," is the Mint, the exceptional profits of which are responsible for nearly the whole of the large increase of £441,000 under that head. This is such an unusual circumstance that I ought to say a word about it. The amount payable into the Exchequer under this head consists of the profits on the coinage of silver and bronze token coins, less the sum required to defray the working expenses of the Mint. For some years past the Exchequer receipts from this source have been steadily declining. In 1901–2 they were as much as £595,000. In 1903–4 they had sunk to £174,000, in 1904–5, to £44,000, and in 1905–6 they were as low as £26,000. The main cause of that heavy and progressive decline was that during the period of the South African War there had been a very active demand for coinage, which caused the supplies to become redundant in slacker years. Hense for the past two years there had been comparatively little coinage of new silver, as it was possible to meet the demands merely by the recoinage of worn silver when withdrawn, and these recoinages, of course, yield the Mint no profit, but rather a loss, as the coins have to be made up to standard weight before they are reissued. A year ago it was obvious that the turning point of the depression had been reached, and accordingly, in my Budget of last year, the Mint raised their estimate of receipts to £150,000. The result has far exceeded anticipations. The receipts have actually been £535,000. I am informed that the increase results from a revived demand all round, of which, no doubt, the activity in trade is the chief cause; but it is partly due to the exceptional Colonial demand, the Colonies which have been chiefly responsible for the increase being West Africa and Australasia. Another special contributory cause was the general election, to provide for the various requirements of which half a million of silver was taken. In view of these considerations, it was thought prudent to reduce the estimate to £201,000 for next year. So far, I have been dealing with exceptional and unforeseen causes of increase.

REVENUE RETURNS.

I now turn to the Revenue returns, as a whole. I cannot say they anywhere exhibit very great elasticity. In some respects, in view of the undoubted prosperity of trade, they are distinctly disappointing. As regards dutiable articles of consumption, tea and sugar have in each case very slightly exceeded the Budget estimate. For sugar there has been throughout the year a quiet and steady market, with an even level of prices, on the whole favourable to the consumer. The reduction of the tea duty by one penny was followed by an increase in the consumption of 4,500,000lbs. The year in tea has been a record one as regards imports, exports, and consumption. The great increase throughout the world in the demand, particularly for Indian teas, has raised the price, but there is little reason to doubt that but for the reduction of duty there would have been a still higher rise. Tobacco has not quite realised my expectations. Now I would say one word on what is really a more interesting item to the majority of the members of the Committee—the alcoholic group, in which there has been since 1899, as I pointed out last year, a progressive and formidable decline. Speaking strictly for the moment from the point of view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I am glad to observe that there are at last signs of a slight, but definite, reaction. The Excise receipts on beer and domestic spirits have exceeded the estimate by £150,000; the Customs receipts on wine by £60,000; and on foreign spirits by no less than £435,000. As compared with the actual receipts of 1905-6, the progress of the whole group shows in 1906-7 an increase of £494,000. The income-tax brought in a little more than the estimate. Our other two sources of revenue in addition to those with which I have dealt—namely, stamps and the Post Office—have fallen short of my expectations. The decrease in stamps of £200,000 is entirely attributable to the Stock Exchange and the shrinking in value of the securities which are there marketed. The receipts from deeds, bills of exchange, and companies' capital duty all show a very satisfactory increase. The check which has occurred to the normal growth of the Post Office revenue is more difficult to explain. The year 1905-6 was a year of unbounded prosperity for the Post Office; the receipts exceeded those of the previous year by over a million and were nearly half a million higher than the estimate which had been formed of them. In the four years preceding 1905-6 the average annual increase of the Post Office revenue was £670,000. For the year 1906-7 the estimated increase after allowing for the concessions promised in the Budget was £735,000; the increase actually realized was only £415,000. The causes to which the Post Office authorities attributed this comparative failure—for it is only comparative, not real—were, first, the less expansion in the demand for picture postcards, which have recently been a growing source of revenue, and secondly, the effect of the telephone in supplanting communication through the post. A great many people, particularly within the limits of the same town or district, who used to communicate by post, now speak through the telephone, and the revenue to that extent suffers. The third cause to which this comparative failure is attributed is the less rapid growth of revenue from telephone trunk lines. I ought to add the non-recurrence of a general election, as the general election largely stimulated postal revenue.

If hon. Gentlemen will now turn to the table showing the comparative revenue raised by the State for the year 1906–7 and the previous year they will realise that the revenue with respect to the Exchequer is not the only revenue for which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is responsible. He has also to make payments to the Local Taxation Account, which amounted in all for the year 1906-07 to £10,222,000. Of this there was derived from the surtax on beer and spirits £1,416,000; Excise licences, £4,122,000; and estate duties, £4,684,000. If you add this money to the Exchequer account of £144,814,000, it makes a total of £155,036,000. If for the moment we confine our attention to the revenue raised from taxes, adding the local taxation revenue to that which goes to the Exchequer, we shall see that instead of being, as would appear from the Table No. 2, only £119,830,000, the revenue receipts from taxes would be £130,052,000. I had also to provide during the year for capital expenditure amounting to £5,975,000, for which we borrowed £5,555,000, the difference being made up out of balances. The total amount which had to be provided in the year was thus £160,591,000.

Another table (to complete the account for the year) shows the Exchequer balance-sheet. We began the year with an Exchequer balance of £10,451,000, and ended with a balance of £6,932,000. I ought to explain how the difference was made up. The balance was strengthened by a surplus revenue this year of £5,399,000. It was depleted by the issue of the old sinking fund of the previous year to the amount of £3,466,000; by a capital expenditure which was issued in excess of what was borrowed in the year amounting to £420,000; by some small sums £32,000; and then by the rather important item of Treasury bills, temporarily paid off under the Act of last year, amounting to £5,000,000. We took power in the Act of last year to do what previously we could not have done—namely, in the first quarter of the year, when our balance is large, not to renew the Treasury bills we otherwise should have renewed. We were previously in the ridiculous situation of going into the market to borrow money in connection with Treasury bills when the balance at the Exchequer was more than sufficient to meet our requirements. Therefore, we took power last year temporarily to drop those bills, and there has been a considerable saving in interest. For the moment the Exchequer balances are reduced to that extent. That is all I need say in reference to the finance of last year.

ESTIMATED EXPENDITURE OF CURRENT YEAR.

Now I come to the current year. First I will deal with the estimated expenditure. An addition of £500,000 to the new Sinking Fund was peculiar to last year, and is not included in the expenditure which the present Budget has to provide. The figures are familiar to hon. Members. I will not go through them except to note that the estimated balance out of revenue assigned to local taxation is £10,045,000. The figures exhibit total reductions over the estimated expenditure of the previous year of £1,664,000. I hope that reduction will be continuous and progessive. It is, in fact, considerably greater than it appears to be, because we have borne on the Army and Navy Votes for the current year sums amounting to £1,019,000, which under the pre-existing system would have been borrowed and charged to capital account. The real reduction, therefore, on the expenditure is £2,683,000. The main item of increase is in the Civil Services, and it is attributable to a large extent to the automatic growth in the cost of elementary education. As I have mentioned, £10,045,000 is assigned out of revenue to local taxation. The estimated capital expenditure for the year is £3,850,000. The total provision for the year is thus on all these accounts £154,652,000.

ESTIMATED REVENUE.

Now I come to the estimated revenue of the country. In regard to that, it is to be remembered that next year is leap year, will have one less Sunday than the past year, and contains no Eastertide. That makes a serious difference to the Exchequer, because it means a gain of two working days. On the other hand, we have lost the coal duty which we had for seven months during the past year, and we have lost the extra penny of the tea duty which was in force for the first six weeks of the last financial year. Perhaps it will be convenient if I give the figures and then make such comments as I have to make. Customs, £31,740,000, showing a diminution, owing to the causes I have mentioned, of £1,190,000; excise, £30,600,000, an increase of £250,000; estate duties, £13,600,000, a diminution (because we cannot reckon on a continuance of this abnormal mortality among the very rich) of £800,000; stamps, £8,000,000, a small increase of £50,000; land tax, £700,000, house duty, £1,900,000, a decrease in the former, and an increase in the other which practically balance one another; and then the important item of property and income-tax, £32,500,000, or an increase of £900,000 on the amount received last year. That gives a total estimated tax revenue of £119,040,000, or a diminution as compared with the tax revenue of last year of £790,000. Then I come to the non tax revenue—Post Office, £17,600,000, an increase of £430,000; telegraphs, £4,400,000, an increase of £145,000; Crown lands, £500,000, a diminution of £20,000; receipts from Suez Canal shares, £1,100,000, an increase of £2,000; and miscellaneous, £1,550,000, a decrease of £391,000, which I have already explained in dealing with the Mint. The total non-tax revenue is estimated to be £25,150,000, or an increase of £166,000 as compared with the preceding year. Adding these figures together, you get a total Exchequer revenue of £144,190,000, or a diminution as compared with the preceding year of £624,000.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.

The estimates of Customs and Excise have been framed after making what seems a safe allowance for the increased spending power of the consuming classes. There is an exceptionally large increase in the income-tax, no less than £900,000, partly due to the early date of Easter having delayed the collection this year and thrown an unusual proportion of the receipts for 1906–7 into 1907–8, and it is partly due to the fact that two good years now come into the three years' average on which the income-tax returns are made up. The other items call for little remark except the item "Miscellaneous," which I have already explained, and the estate duties, a most uncertain element, which we have put at £13,600,000, £400,000 in excess of the last Budget Estimate and £800,000 behind the actual receipts. This brings out a total estimated Exchequer revenue for the year of, as I have said, £144,190,000; and if you set that against the estimated expenditure of £140,757,000, it shows an estimated surplus for the year of £3,433,000. To save further reference to the matter, I must deduct from that a sum of £200,000 which has not appeared on the Estimates, and represents a temporary continuance for another year of the grant in aid made last year to necessitous school areas, which, in consequence of the failure of the Education Bill to pass into law, it is necessary to renew. The available surplus is thus reduced to £3,233,000.

CAPITAL LIABILITIES OF THE STATE.

Before I pass away from the examination of last year, I must explain what we have done during the year in regard to the capital liabilities of the State. I endeavoured in my last year's Budget speech to make clear the distinction between what is popularly called the National Debt, the dead weight debt of the country, and the other capital liabilities which have been for the most part created during the last fifteen years for special purposes against specific assets, actual or potential, and each with a Sinking Fund of its own. I will deal with the two things separately. I take first the dead weight debt—the National Debt, popularly so-called, which consists of three items—the Funded Debt, the estimated capital liabilities in regard to terminable annuities, and the Unfunded or floating Debt. I will compare each of these items as they stood respectively on 1st April, 1906, and 31st March, 1907. The Funded Debt on 1st April, 1906, was £634,048,000, and on 31st March it was £631,929,000, a reduction of £2,119,000. The estimated capital liabilities in regard to terminable annuities on 1st April, 1906, were £43,459,000, and on 31st March, 1907, £40,864,000, a reduction of £2,595,000. The Unfunded Debt on 1st April was £65,713,000—and I ought to add a word of caution before I read the next figure—and on 31st March, 1907, £51,713,000, or an apparent reduction of £14,000,000; but the actual reduction was not £14,000,000, but £9,000,000, £5,000,000 being due to the temporary dropping of the Treasury bills, of which I have given an explanation; but after allowance has been made for that, there was an actual realised reduction on the Unfunded Debt during the year of no less than £9,000,000 sterling. The permanent reduction, as the Committee will see, effected during the course of the year 1906–7 in the National Debt was £13,714,000. It is only fair and right to say that in making that large reduction we are indebted to the extent of £3,466,000 to the Old Sinking Fund left by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Worcestershire, East.

Mr. Asquith.

WAR DEBT.

I think it will be convenient to the Committee to point out to what extent this reduction has affected the additional debt caused by the war. The debt contracted during the war was as follows:—Treasury bills, £13,000,000; Exchequer bonds, amounting in all to £24,000,000; the War Loan stock, which falls due in 1910, £30,000,000; and the new issue of Consols, £92,000,000. So that the total addition made to the debt of the country in consequence of the war was £159,000,000. Now, Sir, it will be interesting to the Committee to see how far that additional debt has been reduced. It now stands at £138,827,000. In other words the war debt has been reduced, almost entirely in the last two years, by £20,173,000, and of that amount the reduction effected in the last financial year 1906–7 was £9,643,000. That is to say, what I have said shows that during the past year the war debt has been reduced by £9,643,000, and the total deadweight debt by £13,714,000. That does not complete the matter, because we have also the other capital liabilities of the State to take into account. In regard to those other liabilities, I anticipated that we might have to raise during the year £6,500,000, which, after allowing for the Sinking Fund charged upon the Votes, would mean a total net addition of £4,600,000. The total amount issued has been £5,975,000, of which £420,000 is provided out of balances, and the amount borrowed therefore was reduced to £5,555,000, and as the various Sinking Funds that came into operation during the year amounted to £1,666,000, the net addition to the debt was £3,889,000. Some of these items, I am glad to say, will never reappear, one in particular—the Cunard agreement, under which we had to issue last year £1,684,000. If the addition under that head is subtracted from the reduction made on the National Debt, it will appear that the gross liabilities of the nation were reduced during the year by £9,825,000.

REDUCTION OF DEBT.

Now I turn to the current year. In the current year the fixed provision for reducing the Debt automatically is £28,000,000, being £500,000 less than last year. We have made during last year the last two payments on account of Chancery funds annuity, amounting to £1,162,000 in all. The result is that, out of the fixed Debt charge there will be applicable to the reduction of Debt during the year £9,383,000, in addition to the realised surplus of last year, £5,399,000. The two together make up £14,782,000; and, if I add miscellaneous receipts to the reduction of Debt—including the China indemnity of £318,000—estimated to amount in all to £600,000, the total sum available should be not less than £15,382,000. The issues on account of capital liabilities, happily, as I have said, growing less year by year, are estimated as likely to be £3,850,000, of which £2,855,000 is authorised by existing Acts, and the balance under the Telegraph Bill to be introduced this Session. On the other hand, there is provided, on the Votes for the repayment of principal of this class of liabilities, a sum of £2,030,000; so that the maximum addition for the year cannot exceed £1,970,000. Therefore, the estimated sum available during the current year for the diminution of the gross liabilities of the State is £13,400,000. Sir, if I may take the two years together, I should like the Committee to keep the figures in their mind. First of all, I will take the deadweight Debt. If you take the actual reduction in 1906–7 and the sums which are applicable or will be applicable to the reduction of the Debt in 1907–8, they make a total for the two years of £29,096,000. On the other hand, if you take the gross liabilities of the nation, the actual reduction in 1906–7 and the sum which is applicable or will be applicable to reduction in 1907-8, make a total reduction on the whole of the capital liabilities of the nation for the two years of no less than £23,225,000.

FINANCIAL POLICY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Now, Sir, I have finished, I am glad to say, that somewhat dry, but necessary, recital. Before I come to what I am sure will be to the Committee a much more interesting theme — namely, the intention of the Government as to the disposal of the available surplus, I think it right, on behalf of the Government, to make a more general statement than is usual on these occasions of the lines on which, in our opinion, the finance of the country during the next few years should be directed. It is, I think, a mistake to treat the annual Budget as if it were a thing by itself, and not, as it is, or as it certainly ought to be, an integral part and a necessary link in a connected and coherent chain of policy. In my opinion, and I think it is an opinion that will be shared by a great number of hon. Gentlemen opposite, the country has reached a stage in which, whether we look merely at its fiscal or at its social exigencies, we cannot afford to drift along the stream and treat each year's finance as if it were self-contained. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in other words, ought to Budget, not for one year, but for several years. It is in that spirit that the proposals which I am going presently to submit to the Committee have been conceived, and it is from that point of view that I ask they shall be judged.

STATE OF NATIONAL CREDIT.

What, then, are the lines for financial progress which this Government, and a majority in this House, are bound by their pledges and by their convictions to pursue? First and foremost, we are under an immediate obligation, often insisted upon when we sat upon the other side in the last Parliament, and reiterated certainly by me over and over again at the general election after I had assumed the office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—an immediate obligation of reinstating and improving the national credit. I am bound to say that there is no subject upon which more exaggerated and sometimes more nonsensical language has been used. Consols, like all other so-called gilt-edged securities, have been at a low level of price during the last six months. They once nearly touched eighty-four. Immediately we had an outcry. Some of the more irresponsible among the mischiefmongers of the Press declared that the credit of this country was gone—gone because we had a Liberal Government in power dragged by a Socialist tail. Even a grave and seasoned economist like the hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield began to show signs of perturbation. People forforget the simple and surely indisputable arithmetical fact that a 2½ per cent. Stock at 83, which we have not yet touched, is equivalent to a 3 per cent. stock at 100. They forget further, or perhaps they have never learned the equally indisputable historical fact that our 3 per cent. Consols, the admitted premier security of the world, during the whole course of their long history never remained at or above 100 for a whole year. It is quite true that during the intermediate period after conversion, when Consols were a 2¾ per cent. stock, they rose for some years to a high premium, even as high as 114. How was that? That was at a time when, owing, among other causes, to the relative slackness of trade and to the rapid development of the new source of gold supply in South Africa, the value of money ruled very low, and a secure 2¾ per cent. stock was, what it is not to-day, a very tempting investment. That was a state of things that could not have lasted long, even if the war had not occurred. But there has been a serious fall, and one which has affected all the better class of securities. I think I ought to take this opportunity of giving what I conceive to be the explanation. It is not far to seek, and it has nothing whatever to do, I venture to submit, with the misdoings, actual or imagined, of His Majesty's present advisers. We have seen in recent years enormous additions, due not only to the war, but also to other causes, to the liabilities both of the State and of the municipalities; the admission of colonial stocks to the extent of something like £300,000,000 sterling to the category of trust investments; abnormal activity leading to higher wages and higher prices in almost every form of business both at home and abroad; catastrophes in North and South America which have brought about a considerable destruction of insured property, much of which had to be replaced by the realisation of gilt-edged securities; and gigantic speculations in shares and the issue of new obligations which have been going on upon the other side of the Atlantic. Take all these causes into account, following as they have done an exceptional drain upon the whole fabrics of currency and of credit, and operating as they were bound to do with converging force here in London, which is the only free and open market for gold, and you have more than sufficient reason to account for the low level of price in the best class of security. These patriotic gentlemen to whom I referred a few moments ago might, I think, find some better occupation both for their tongues and their pens than trying to disparage and belittle the credit of their country, which still, when all is said and done, remains better and higher than that of any other country in the world. But the fact remains that the existing condition of things, which is largely the result, as I have said, of the unliquidated commitments of recent years, is for the time being a source of embarrassment, not to the Government alone. Happily, there is no question of the Government's, as a Government, having to go into the market to add to the debt for which we are directly liable. Take, however, the case of Irish land security, which is guaranteed by the British Government. Fresh issues of that stock must from time to time be made to keep the operation of purchase going, and the whole loss upon the flotation of that stock which must arise in the present state of the market falls upon the Irish Development Grant, which, if my memory is right, was originally intended to serve the purpose of Irish education. It is a mistake to suppose that this is a matter which only affects the City, what is called the "high finance." It affects every community and every class in the country. Look at the position of our great municipalities. From the London County Council downwards they can raise capital only upon terms which, as compared with those of ten years ago, are grievously burdensome to the ratepayers, with the result that in every direction their activity is being crippled. You may think, if you like, that some forms of their activity are misguided, but there are some, at any rate, innocuous, and others absolutely essential to the well-being of the community. What is true of them is true, in varying degrees of inconvenience and of severity, of almost every trading concern in the country. Taking these facts into view, I have no hesitation in drawing the conclusion that a substantial and exceptional effort to effect a further reduction in the Debt is, for the moment, one of the paramount duties of the Government.

SOCIAL REFORM.

But behind and beyond this there lies the whole still unconquered territory of social reform. Social reform may be regarded, according to the point of view from which you look at it, as a luxury or as a necessity, but in any case it is expensive. It has to be paid for. Someone must be prepared to meet the bill. Well, now, this is a House of Commons which was elected more clearly and definitely than any other House in our history in the hope and belief on the part of the electors that it would find the road and provide the means for social reform. No doubt social reform is a phrase vague in itself, which carries different meanings to different minds. But there are some things which it certainly means to all of us who sit upon this side of the House, and I fancy to a good many who sit opposite. I myself, for instance—if I may refer to myself—am not what is called a Socialist. I believe in the right of every man face to face with the State to make the best of himself, and, subject to the limitation that he does not become a nuisance or a danger to the community, to make less than the best of himself. This world is much too full of wrong-doing, and of injustice, and of unmerited suffering; but, in my judgment, the way of escape is not to be found in any solution, or so-called solution, which, by slowly but surely drying up the reservoir which gives vitality to human personality and human purpose, will in the long run leave the universe a more sterile place. I say this in no polemical spirit, not at all, but simply by way of emphasising the fact that to all of us—people like myself who may be regarded by some of my hon. friends below the gangway as a lukewarm Moderate—there is nothing that calls so loudly or so imperiously as the possibilities of social reform. Just let me, in order to make plain what I am going to say, invite the House to look at two sets of figures in our modern community, whose appeal is irresistible.

THE STATE AND THE CHILD.

First of all there is the child, for whom heredity and parental care have perhaps done nothing or worse than nothing. And yet it is the raw material, upon the fashioning of which depends whether it shall add to the common stock of wealth and intelligence and goodness, or whether it shall be cast aside as a waste product in the social rubbish heap. The State has long recognised that it cannot pass by that appeal with folded arms. It has put the child to school, it keeps the child at school, and (much as it shocks some excellent people) after the legislation of last year, if the poor body of the child is benumbed with cold or pinched with hunger so that it can get no benefit from its lessons, it will even go so far as to help to provide it with bread Does the House realise what the recognition of that means on the part of the State, what every one of us now agrees is a duty, though it was neglected and passed by generation after generation by humane and far-sighted statesmen? Does anyone realise what the performance of that duty has cost this community? Let me give two or three figures which I think very striking. In the year 1869–70, the last year of what I may call the old system, the total cost of education to the public in the form of Parliamentary grants—for of course there was no rate-aid at that time—was £721,000. What was it in the year 1906–7? Your Parliamentary grants, if you add the Exchequer contributions, as you ought to, were £13,359,000; sums raised by local rates were £11,785,000; a total of £25,144,000. That is what it has cost the State to recognise its duty to the children of the community. I do not say that every penny or every pound of that money is well or wisely spent. I rejoice to think that we have at the head of the Board of Education my right hon. friend the President, a severe economist, who subjects the whole of this expenditure to a most searching review. But this I do say, that there is not a man who sits on either side of the House who is prepared substantially to recede from the performance of this enormous duty. Well, that is one thing.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS.

There is another thing, nearer the other end of the journey of life, which makes an equally strong, though hitherto an unavailing, appeal both to the interest and to the conscience of society —I mean the figure of the man or woman who, perhaps, spent out with a life of ill-requited labour, find themselves confronted in old age, without fault or demerit of their own, with the prospect of physical want and the sacrifice of self-respect. Sir, I never gave, nor, so far as I know, did any of my colleagues on this Bench give, any pledge at the elections on the subject of what is called old-age pensions. We knew something of the magnitude of the problem, and we thought it wrong to raise expectations without the knowledge that they could be met. Nor do I now commit myself or any of my colleagues to any specific scheme, although both my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and myself have laid down certain conditions to which, in our judgment, any practical proposal must conform. Whatever is done in this matter, as I have said before in this House, must be done by steps and stages, and cannot be achieved at a single blow. But this I do say, and I wish to say it with all the emphasis of which I am capable, speaking for the whole of my colleagues who sit upon this Bench, that in the sphere of finance we regard this as the most serious and the most urgent of all the demands for social reform; and that it is our hope—I will go further and say it is our intention, before the close of this Parliament—yes, before the close of the next session of this Parliament, if we are allowed to have our way—it is a large "if"—to lay firm the foundations of this reform.

FREE TRADE.

To that general statement there is one thing that I want to add, though perhaps the addition is hardly necessary. We are a free-trade Government. This is a free-trade House of Commons. Whatever new resources we can provide for any purpose I have indicated are subject to that governing condition. In a sense, of course, that involves a limitation of the area. [OPPOSITION Cries of "Hear, hear."] I thought that sentence would be appreciated. But it is a limitation of the area only in the sense in which a wise builder, who is seeking to lay the foundations of an enduring structure, recognises the limits which divide firm ground from an unfathomable morass. We do not dogmatise about free trade. We are neither professors nor missionaries. There is nothing we need say to countries which adopt other systems than our own. But for us here, 43,000,000 of people in these two small islands, dependent as we are upon extraneous sources of supply for the food of the people and the materials of the industry, the one free, open, untrammelled market in the whole world—for us, I say, free trade is the breath of life, and there is no social reform that would not be dearly purchased by its sacrifice. Well, I think we do not always sufficiently recognise the immense advantage which we had in the recent controversy from the fact that protection presented itself to the electors of this country in its most questionable and vulnerable shape. It was entangled from the first, and it was ultimately strangled, by being bound up with the taxation of corn and meat, the first necessaries of life; and, as we showed, must have the inevitable consequence, if the proposed scheme were to be fairly applied as between different parts of the Empire, of taxing the raw materials of our different industries. [OPPOSITION cries of "Why?"] I have argued the question on a hundred platforms, and I am not going to do so again. I am only expressing my opinion that it was that which killed protection, and it is that which will kill it again. But, Sir, I can conceive the protectionist invitation being couched in much more insidious and much more alluring accents. I think, therefore, that it is wise for us who are, as I have said, not only the party of social reform, but the party also of free trade, to make it clear if we can—and I believe we can make it clear—that the attainment of the one is not incompatible with the maintenance of the other.

TAXATION AND SOCIAL REFORM.

That may seem to be a digression, but it really has, as the Committee will see, a very direct bearing upon the concrete proposals I am now going to make. I repeat if we are to have social reform we must be ready to pay for it, and when I say "we" I mean the whole nation—the working and consuming classes as well as the wealthier class of direct taxpayers. An important practical inference at once arises. If these two objects, the strengthening of our national credit and the provision for social reform, are to be the governing aims of our policy, large as my estimated surplus may seem to be, I cannot deal with it in such a way as to involve any permanent diminution of revenue of a substantial character.

That puts at once on one side more than one suggestion which, in other circumstances I might yield to, for the remission or repeal of particular taxation. For instance, I have been urged, in the course of the year to repeal almost every tax, but I have been urged with particular insistence to deal with what are called the war taxes. What are the war taxes? They cover a pretty wide area of ground. They include 4d. on the income-tax, the whole of the sugar duties, one penny still of the tea tax, and all the extra imposts on tobacco, beer, and spirits, amounting, I suppose altogether, to something like £20,000,000 sterling. From this point of view, although they are all war taxes, each of them is equally entitled to consideration. What is a war tax? A war tax is not a tax put on to last during a war and to come to an end the moment peace is concluded and your Army is withdrawn from the field. It is a tax which is put on to meet the extra burden imposed on the country by waging war; and so long as that extra burden remains—and it remains, as I have shown to the Committee, to the tune of something like £130,000,000 of extra debt—the claim that the war tax qua war tax can be removed is, in my opinion, an inadmissible claim. I will just say two or three words about one or two particular duties with regard to which special appeals have been made.

COCOA DUTY.

First of all, there is a little duty, a very small one, to which I observe my predecessor in office is beginning to pay a good deal of attention—the cocoa duty.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): I have not asked you to take it off.

*MR. ASQUITH: The cocoa duty produces, I think, about £250,000. It is a very small and not very productive tax. I think, if you ask me the question, as the right hon. Gentleman did, by implication, this afternoon, that there is a good deal of the flavour of protection about the present scale of cocoa duty. I should not defend it myself from the point of view of a free-trader, and I do not think it is defensible; but it is a very small affair, and you must notice this about it, that this duty, with its protectionist flavour, has stood the scrutiny, and has been preserved, at any rate, with the connivance of Mr. Gladstone, of Sir William Harcourt, of Sir Stafford Northcote, of Mr. Goschen, and of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who slightly increased its protective character—a string, I should think, of as good and severe free-traders as have ever been responsible for the finances of this country. I might say that what was good enough for them is good enough for me. At any rate, I think that, with that history behind the cocoa duty, I may safely postpone, as I propose to do, the expurgation of this very small protectionist taint, which, I admit, still lurks in this particular part of our fiscal system. So much for the cocoa duty.

TEA AND SUGAR DUTIES.

Then there is the case of tea and sugar. The tea duty was reduced last year by a 1d. It now stands at 5d., that is to say only a 1d. above the lowest point it reached before the time of the war, and I am satisfied, from a careful review of the existing conditions of the trade, that any further attempt at this moment to deal with the duty, in the way of reduction of another 1d., would not be of any real profit to the consumers of tea. The sugar duty is one of a very peculiar character. It bring in over £6,000,000, which is, to my mind, almost as strong an argument as you could possible use for not lightly interfering with it. Objectionable as I think it is, and have always thought it, as a tax both on the food of the poor and upon the raw material of several important industries, it is a duty with which you cannot deal piecemeal. It is a duty which, translated into terms of retail prices, works out at something like ½d. on the ordinary pound of sugar, and, as we do not deal in this country in retail trade with farthings, I say, if you were to halve the sugar duty I do not think you would do any good whatever to the great bulk of consumers in the country. You might do good to some of the trades, like the confectionery and the mineral water trades, in which sugar is a raw material, but I do not believe you would benefit the working classes or the consuming part of the community unless you get rid of the duty altogether. That is out of the question, and I dismiss it from consideration. I say, generally, having regard to the principle which I have laid down, the practical conclusion to which I have come is that I must not permanently impair my sources of revenue in view of the future, and I do not propose this year to make any change in the indirect taxation of the country.

PROPOSED CHANGES—IMPERIAL EXCHEQUER AND LOCAL TAXATION.

I now come to the changes which I am in fact going to propose. First of all, I will deal with a matter which, though it does not immediately affect, for good or evil, the revenue of this particular year, is, in my judgment, of the greatest importance with regard to the future. I refer to the relations between the Imperial Exchequer and local taxation. I propose, as from the end of the present financial year—I cannot break up the year for this purpose—but, as from the 1st of April next, to sweep away, root and branch, the whole system by which assigned revenue, the proceeds of Imperial taxes, is intercepted from the Exchequer and handed over to local authorities. The arrangements which I ask Parliament to terminate were initiated nearly twenty years ago, in 1888, by the late Lord Goschen, whom we have lost since I last presented a Budget to this House. He was a great financier, a great administrator, a man who brought a rare combination of clear insight, cultured intelligence, subtle reasoning power, wide expert knowledge, and indomitable and inflexible courage, to the service of the State. Lord Goschen introduced this system, and his scheme, as conceived by him and as presented to this House in 1888, had, no doubt, a good deal to recomend it. He had a twofold object in view—first, to provide a contribution from personalty towards local expenditure, and next, to effect a permanent settlement between local and Imperial taxation by handing over to local authorities certain duties or taxes. Amongst these were the licensing duties, which it was intended should be collected locally, a power at the same time being given to the local authorities to vary them by raising or lowering them, a moiety of the probate duty on personal property, and certain proposed new taxes—the van and wheel tax, which never saw the light of day, together with the surtaxes on beer and spirits, which were assigned with the special object of providing funds for compensation for the extinction of licences. That was the scheme, but as all of us who were here at the time, and as all know as a matter of history, in the course of its passage through this House it was mutilated beyond all recognition. The van and wheel tax was abandoned. The local authorities got the licensing duties, it is true, but without the power of raising them, and without the power of collecting them. They were really Imperial taxes, collected by Imperial officers, which, by a thoroughly illogical and indefensible process, never came to the Imperial Exchequer, but were intercepted on the way, and reached the hands of the local authorities, who had nothing to do with them but to spend them. As regards the death duties, with the revision of those duties in 1894 by Sir William Harcourt even the semblance of a special contribution from personalty to local taxation disappeared; and the Agricultural Rates Act and various other Acts which have since been passed have rendered the system even more intolerable than it was before.

Mr. Asquith.

The Committee may not find it interesting, but I think it is necessary to show what the present condition of things is. First of all, there is the estate duty. Part of it, representing the old probate duty, goes, under the Act of 1894, to the Local Taxation Account, and is divided between the three kingdoms in certain fixed proportions, though it is a variable amount. And it is further complicated by this, that, owing to the passing of the Tithe Rent-Charge Act, from the English portion of that varying amount another varying amount is every year deducted for the purpose of the tithe rent-charge grant. Then a further part of the estate duty goes to agricultural rates. In England, that contribution is made entirely out of the estate duty. In Scotland it is made mainly out of the estate duty, with, also, a grant from the Consolidated Fund; and in Ireland it is wholly made out of the Consolidated Fund. Take the case of licences. In England and Scotland the proceeds of the local taxation licences are given to the various authorities according to the amount collected in their several areas. Ireland gets three so-called equivalents. I am not sure, though I do not want to raise any question of controversy with hon. Gentlemen whom I see sitting opposite to me, that they are not a good deal more than equivalents. But, at all events, they receive three so-called equivalents for these licence duties out of the Consolidated Fund. And, finally, you have the beer and spirits duty, which is divided between the three kingdoms in the fixed proportion. Could a more head-splitting condition of chaos and confusion possibly be presented to the House of Commons? I think that everybody concerned either with local or Imperial taxation will agree that it is time that the system was put an end to. It will stop an enormous amount of complication and difficulty in our national accounts; and, from the point of view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which is the point of view from which I mainly regard it at the moment, it will set his hands free, as they are not free at present, to deal with some of the most important sources of taxation. I have been pressed very much to alter and raise the duty on motor-cars. I should be very much disposed to do so. I think a tax on motor-cars is almost an ideal tax, because it is a tax on a luxury which is apt to degenerate into a nuisance. But it is no good, so long as this system prevails, for me or for anyone else to put an additional duty on motor-cars; for where does the duty go to? It goes to the local authority by whom these duties are collected, that is to say, as a rule, the local authority within whose area the person resides to whom the motor-car belongs. Suppose I pay, under a new addition to the motor duty, as I should pay, here in London, an extra duty on my motor-car, the benefit goes entirely to the London County Council. But it is not the streets and roads of London to which my motor-car does injury, it is to the rural districts of England and Scotland. Nothing can be more illogical or unjust than that distribution of the matter. Let me take another case, much more important—take the duty on the licences of public-houses. I wish to have my hands set free in that matter also. At present the proceeds of those duties go to the Local Taxation Account, and there, again, they go to the local authorities in proportion to the number of licences which are taken out in their respective areas. You could not possibly have a system better calculated to put a premium on a lethargic and non-public-spirited licensing authority. To set free the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for these and other purposes it is eminently desirable that he should recover complete control over the whole of this class of duties. I do not want the local authorities to suffer; as far as my plan is concerned, they will not suffer and will not be one halfpenny out of pocket. I propose that in future, after the close of the present financial year, they should no longer have any concern with probate duty, local taxation licences, or beer and spirits, but that they should receive from the Consolidated Fund a sum equivalent to the proceeds of these respective sources of revenue that at present go to the Local Taxation Account, and at the present rates of charge. I mean, of course, that, if in the future you raise the duties of any of this class of licences, that is not to be taken into account in the sum which the local authorities are to receive.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: They would share in any natural growth?

*MR. ASQUITH: They would share in any natural growth—that is to say, they would receive precisely the same sum in any year as they would receive now if the present state of things was continued; a natural growth or a natural diminution, as the case may be. The object is, as I say, first of all to get rid of an enormous, most unsightly and inconvenient complication in our national accounts; secondly, to set free the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to a large area of taxation; and thirdly, to clear the ground—for this is only a provisional arrangement—for a future re-settlement, I hope on equitable terms, of the whole relations between the central authority and the local authorities. That is the first of the proposals that I make to the House, and I hope it may be received as of almost a non-controversial character.

INCOME-TAX.

Now I come to more thorny ground. I have said that I do not propose in any way to alter indirect taxation; but I do propose to deal with the income-tax. The income-tax, as it is one of the most productive, so it is one of the most delicate parts of our fiscal machinery. There is nothing like it to be found anywhere else in the world. It produced this year something like £32,000,000 to the Exchequer, and the largest part of that sum, no less than two-thirds of the whole, through the operation of our system of deduction at the source, is collected, without difficulty or friction, without any necessity for the taxpayer to draw a cheque or even open his purse, and almost without his being made conscious that he is being taxed at all—I said almost. As regards the remainder, one-third of the whole, the process of ascertaining and getting in what is due with ease and expedition depends upon a certain amount, at any rate, of co-operation—it is not expected to be very cordial—between the taxing authority and the person assessed, and still more upon the harmonious interaction of the central and localised parts of the machine. Now there is nothing in the world easier, I know it because I have tried the experiment, than to sit down at a table and draw up on a piece of paper an ideally perfect scheme of income-tax, logically graduated from the top to the bottom, safeguarded by an elaborate machinery of inquisition, and detection, and punishment, all administered by the pitiless and impartial hands of a perfectly dispassionate central authority. Nothing is so easy on paper; but when you are brought into contact, as I am almost daily, with the actual administrative problem, you find you have to content yourself with something very much less ambitious. And if the reform I am about to propose falls short, as I am afraid it will, of some people's expectation, it is governed and limited by severely practical considerations. The income-tax is really a twofold tax, it is a tax on property and a tax on earnings. I start with this proposition, and a most important proposition it is, that it must now be regarded as an integral and permanent part of our financial system. If that proposition is once enunciated and admitted, it makes it impossible to justify, if there be any practical way of escape, the present incidence of the income-tax. After you have reached the limit of abatement, which is now £700, the State taxes all incomes at the same rate, whatever may be their character or source. Just compare two cases. You have here A, a man who derives, we will say, a thousand a year from a perfectly safe investment in the funds, perhaps accumulated and left to him by his father; on the other hand you have B, a man making the same nominal sum by personal labour in the pursuit of some arduous and perhaps precarious profession or some form of business. The one is under no necessity to make provision either for his children or for old age; the income will go on being automatically received as long as the investment remains; the other, if a man of ordinary prudence, is bound, his work being carried on subject to risks to health and all the other vicissitudes of fortune, year by year to deduct from his nominal income and set aside a sufficient sum to make provision for contingencies in the future. To say that those two people are, from the point of view of the State, to be taxed in the same way is, to my mind, flying in the face of justice and common sense. That is the feature of the tax which has never been justified by any of the great men, Mr. Pitt, Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Gladstone, and the others who have been concerned in its introduction and development; it has always been palliated on the ground either that the income tax was a mere temporary expedient, or that it was impossible to make the distinction without destroying its productiveness, which is the same thing as saying that it ought not to be more than a temporary expedient. For a tax whose effective continuance involves the annual perpetration of a gross injustice is a tax which ought to be reserved, at any rate, for great and pressing emergencies.

HISTORY OF INCOME-TAX.

If I am not wearying the Committee, as this is very important, let me very briefly review the history of the tax. The income-tax was introduced by Mr. Pitt in 1798, in almost the darkest hour in our great struggle with France. It was avowedly a temporary tax put on for the purposes of war. Our ancestors, when they did these things, did not do them by halves, and the tax was 2s. in the £. Incomes of £60 and under were exempt, and up to £200 there was a differential rate proceeding by steps. That tax was reintroduced, after a year of peace, in 1802–1803, by Mr. Addington, at the lower rate of 1s. In 1806, war still continuing, it was raised by Lord Henry Petty, the Whig Chancellor of the Exchequer, to 2s.; and he for the first time introduced a distinction, since dropped, between earned and unearned incomes by providing—and this was the state of things that prevailed from 1806 to 1816—that, as regards abatements, only earned incomes should be entitled to them. In 1816 the tax came to an end, and, although Lord Liverpool's Government attempted to continue it, they were, by a large majority of this House, defeated in their attempt; and I think it was Mr. Brougham who moved that all the records of the tax should be burnt or destroyed, in order that posterity should never know that such a tax had existed. That was the early history of the tax. It was revived in 1842 by Sir Robert Peel, not as a war tax, but again as a temporary expedient, only for a period of three years, to enable him to effect a reconstruction of the tariff. Mr. Gladstone never liked the income-tax; as a member of Sir Robert Peel's Government he opposed its introduction; during the whole of his life he was anxious to see its gradual extinction; and on a celebrated historic occasion he invited the country to agree with him in abolishing it altogether. In his picturesque language, speaking of Sir Robert Peel's revival of the tax in 1842, he spoke of calling forth from its repose this giant, which had once shielded us in war, to come to assist our industrious toils in peace. The industrious toils were assisted to this extent, the tax was imposed by Sir Robert Peel at the comparatively moderate rate of 7d. in the pound; but he raised the limit of total exemption to £150, and above that everybody was taxed exactly alike. Sir Robert Peel defended it mainly on the ground that the tax was a temporary one. It was taken in hand again by Mr. Gladstone in 1853, who proposed that it should continue seven years at a diminishing rate, and extended it to Ireland, not altogether without consideration. ["Oh."] He reduced the limit of exemption to £100, but between £100 and £150 gave abatements at a lower rate of tax. I should like to quote two sentences from Mr. Gladstone's speech on that occasion. In refusing to make any differentiation between earned and unearned incomes, he said—

> "I do not at all deny that the case of the professional man appeals to my sympathy; in my opinion, that is one of the reasons which indicate that the tax ought to be a temporary tax."

And again he said—

> "It is not adapted to be a permanent portion of your fiscal system unless you can by reconstruction remove its anomalies."

I found myself on that opinion. We now recognise the tax to be a permanent part of our system; and following Mr. Gladstone, I think that we must do something to remove the anomaly and to arrive at some scheme, without destroying the essential features or the productive character of the tax, which differentiates incomes, not only as to amount, but also as to the source whence they are derived and the conditions under which they are enjoyed. I need not weary the Committee by giving the history of the different steps by which the present scale of abatement has been reached. We all know that in incomes up to £700 there is a substantial abatement; but it may be interesting to point out that at the present rate of 1s. in the pound an income of £200 pays 2½d.; an income of £300, 5½d.; £400, 7¼d.; £500, 8½d.; £600, 9½d.; and £700, 10¾d., so that the Committee will observe that the principle of differentiation prevails now to that extent. What is the result? The income-tax is not only 1s. in the pound, but of the million of taxpayers, 800,000 to 850,000, or four-fifths of the whole, showing an income of £275,000,000, are under £700. This extension of the scale of abatement has much simplified the question. Mr. Gladstone used to say—

> "Take the poor widow with £300 a year derived from investments, and bringing up a family; is she to be placed in a worse position and to be taxed at a higher rate than the small business or professional man making £300 a year from his business?"

There is great force in the argument, but it should be remembered that nobody pays the whole rate unless his or her income is over £700 a year.

REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Having been impressed with these general considerations, I last session moved for the appointment of a Select Committee, which sat under the presidency of my right hon. friend the Member for the Forest of Dean. This Committee took evidence, and made a valuable Report; and I am sure that the House is very much indebted to the members of the Committee for their labours. They were unanimous, as I gather—and it was a Committee which represented all parts and sections of the House—in upholding the necessity of making a difference between earned and unearned incomes. What is an earned income? It is not easy to draw a distinction, but we can but do our best. First of all, there are the incomes of all officers and employés paid by salary. That, I think, includes the clergyman. Although he derives his income and pays income tax under Schedule A from the glebe or tithe rent-charge, his income is really paid to him in consideration of the services rendered by him in the performance of his clerical duties. Secondly, it clearly includes every class of professional man; and, thirdly, all traders whose income is substantially —and I lay stress on the word "substantially"—derived from their own personal labour. In the first two categories no difficulties arise at all. The difficulty arises in the third class—how to take into account the amount of capital a man brings into his business, and to deal with the class of incomes which are either wholly earned or partly earned and partly unearned, means a degree of logical precision where there will be the greatest possible difficulty in hindering overlapping in dubious cases. I am satisfied, however, that a much more practical way of dealing with this branch of the question is to confine the differential treatment to earned incomes which do not exceed £2,000 in amount. The Select Committee suggested £3,000, but I think that £2,000 is quite as far as you can fairly go. I confine the differential treatment, therefore, to persons whose total income from all sources does not exceed £2,000—not merely their earned incomes, but from all sources. In the case of a man who is left £40,000 or £50,000 a year by his father, and by becoming a director of companies earns another £1,000, I think it is absurd to give him a preferential treatment on the score that he is a man with an earned income. I do not think that the principle should be carried to that extent. First of all, therefore, the earned income in respect of which relief is given should not exceed £2,000, and secondly, the whole income from all sources should not exceed £2,000.

METHOD OF DIFFERENTIATION.

How do we carry out the differentiation? I propose that where these conditions are satisfied—the income-tax remaining as a normal tax at the rate of 1s.—the income-tax should be imposed on the earned incomes within these limits at the lower rate of 9d. in the pound, being a relief of 3d. in the pound to this class of income-tax payer. That is to be in addition to, and not in derogation of, all existing exemptions and abatements. The burden of proof will be on the individual claiming the lower rate, and we shall provide that he must make his claim with his return—this is a most important point—if he is a person to whom the formal return is sent and is required to fill it up; if he is not, he must claim exemption and abatement not later than 30th September in the year. In this way we shall avoid the enormous congestion of claims for refunds and abatements which accumulate at the end of every year. It is only fair to say to such a claimant, "If you want to be rated at the lower rate you must be zealous in the matter yourself." I propose to supplement these provisions with another set of provisions which are very much needed, and which carry out in the main the provisions of Lord Ritchie's Committee which sat two or three years ago. That Committee proved that under the present system there is much evasion and leakage. I propose to make it compulsory on every man who receives a form —that well-known buff-coloured form— as one of the annual incidents of the tax to make a declaration and to send back the return, even though all his income may be taxed at the source. If he has no unearned income he must say nil. At present also he is under no penalty, because he is under no statutory obligation to make it. I propose to make it compulsory in all cases that the return shall be made. In the next place, we shall increase the penalties and extend the period of recovery in cases of evasion. In the third place, we shall require extended returns from all employers, whether private persons or companies, requiring them to give not only the names but the salaries of their employés. This will, of course, impose a slight additional burden on the employers, but the precaution will tend enormously to prevent evasion. Further, I propose to repeal Section 133 of the Act of 1842, which allows an abatement of duty at the end of the year of assessment where it is found that the profits of that year fall short of the average of the previous three years. I may add also, as the representative of a Scottish constituency, that as the delay in the collection is almost entirely due to the persons directly assessed—the persons to whom we are going to give relief—we intend that the English machinery shall be levelled up, so that it may with equal efficiency correspond to the admirable machinery at work in Scotland. In order to make the matter clear I should like to point out how the system will work by a concrete instance. I take the amount of income-tax payable on certain incomes under the present and proposed scale. First of all I will take an income of £1,500 a year. At present, whatever may be the source of that income, at the rate of 1s. in the pound it pays £75. Under the new system, if the income is derived wholly from the Funds, it will continue to pay at the rate of 1s. in the pound, or £75. If, however, it is derived wholly from a profession or a trade, it will pay at the lower rate of 9d., or £56 5s. If, on the other hand, it is a composite income, say £500 from the Funds and £1,000 from a profession or trade, it will pay 1s. on the £500 and 9d. on the other portion, or £62 10s. instead of £75. Now as to the abatements. I will take an income of £600. At present such an income is allowed a deduction of £120, so that income-tax is paid on £480 irrespective of the sources of income. Under the new system how will it work out? If the income of £600 is derived wholly from the Funds, it will pay £24; if wholly from a profession or trade, it will pay £18, at the rate of 9d. per pound, coupled with an abatement; and if the income is made up of £200 from the Funds and £400 from a profession or trade, it will pay £20 10s., the abatement of £120 being deducted from professional earnings.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Is the abatement in the case of the mixed income always to be made from the earned portion and not from the unearned?

*MR. ASQUITH: Yes, from the earned portion. The effect of this change will be a very sensible relief to that class of income-tax payers who are grievously oppressed by the present burdens, and it will enable us, with a clear conscience and with much greater ease and simplicity of working, to treat the income-tax, as I intend it should be treated, as a permanent part of our fiscal machinery.

GRADUATION OF INCOME-TAX.

There was another point in connection with this question referred to the Committee presided over by my right hon. friend—the practicability of graduation, whether by progression upwards from the normal tax by an ascending scale for higher incomes, or by degression from the normal rate by a descending scale to a lower rate. On this point there was a considerable divergence of opinion in the Committee, and I may say at once that, quite apart from other reasons, it would not be possible for administrative reasons to introduce any change in graduation simultaneously with the already sufficiently complicated alterations of a differentiated tax. The machinery would break down under the strain. I do not announce at this moment any final opinion on the various schemes submitted to the Committee. I see, as everyone conversant with the national finance must see, enormous difficulties in the application of that principle. It would require a compulsory declaration of income from everyone. I should like to see it very much; but how are we to get it? Only by giving an advantage for it. You get a compulsory declaration now where abatements are claimed. Under the scheme of differentiation you will have no difficulty, because it will be to a man's interest to make the declaration. But the moment you come to tell a man, "You are to declare your income, not for your benefit, but in order that you may be taxed at a higher rate," you find yourself confronting a good many formidable difficulties. As to the experience of foreign countries, in my opinion there is no foreign or colonial experience which is really relevant or helpful. I do not mean because our social and economic conditions are very different. But you will find, if you examine the various systems of so-called graduation, that they all stop at a comparatively low point. Most of them stop at £5,000. As far as I know, none of them go beyond £8,000. That is just about the point where, by compulsory declaration, we should hope to rake in for income-tax a lot of money that we do not now receive. But I am not now expressing a final judgment in the matter. I am pointing out difficulties which must be present to the minds of all who have considered the question; and, as far as the present year is concerned, we must be content with the reforms of differentiation.

COST OF NEW SCHEME.

What will be the cost? This, I may say, is a very opportune moment for making a change of this kind, because, as the Committee will observe from the estimated revenue for the year, we are anticipating an increased receipt from income-tax next year of no less than £900,000. That is a time when we may well be able to risk a little in the way of cost. Nothing is more remarkable in respect of the income-tax, notwithstanding the growing abatements and the rise in the rate of charge, than the growing produce of a penny. In the year before the war, 1898, Sir Michael Hicks Beach completed the present system of abatements up to £700; and the income-tax then stood at 8d. in the pound. Notwithstanding these abatements and the fact that the tax is now at 1s. in the pound, the produce of each penny, which was £2,284,000 in 1898, is now £2,600,000—a remarkable proof of the elasticity of this tax. But it is very difficult to estimate either a possible gain or a possible loss on this tax; though its tendency for many years has been in an upward direction. There are, perhaps from 800,000 to 850,000 persons with incomes between £160 and £700 a year. There are, perhaps, 120,000 taxpayers with incomes between £700 and £2,000 a year. How much of their incomes is earned and how much unearned is largely a matter of conjecture. Therefore, the figure I give must be taken more or less as guess-work. But I estimate, from the best materials available, the loss during the year from this differentiation at £1,250,000. Further, during this first year there will be an additional loss, which will not recur, owing to the delay which must necessarily result in getting in the tax in the early months of next year owing to the more complicated machinery. We anticipate that we ought for safety's sake to reckon that we may be delayed to the extent of £750,000 in the collection. That would make a loss for the year of £2,000,000. But you must set against that the fact that we shall get £900,000 more this year, according to our estimate; and the £750,000 is only a deferred payment and not an actual loss. As I say I do not present it to the Committee as more than a well-founded guess; but I hope it is an outside estimate of the loss.

DEATH DUTIES.

With many apologies for the long time that I am detaining the House, I approach the last chapter of my task. The very substantial relief that I am giving to the income-earner necessarily suggests the question whether, at the other end of the scale, property is contributing its fair proportions. As I said some time ago, I cannot, with a view to the needs of the immediate future, afford any substantial loss of revenue, and I must add that, even if I had not to deal with the income-tax at all, I should have felt myself bound to invite the Committee to consider a revision of the death duties. Whether, and how far, those duties ought to be regarded as a sort of deferred income-tax is a controverted economic problem on which I do not desire to enter. But, at any rate, they are in pari materia; and, indisposed as I am, not only to lose revenue, but to disturb the balance between direct and indirect taxation —and, remember, I am doing nothing directly this year for the indirect taxpayer—unwilling as I am to disturb that balance in favour of direct taxation, I am going unhesitatingly to ask the Committee to inquire with me whether the greater part of what I have lost or may lose in making the income-tax just and equitable may not be recovered without injustice or lack of equity in another way from the owners of property. We all remember the gloomy predictions uttered in this House at the time the late Sir William Harcourt imposed the death duties in 1894. We were told that they would check the accumulation of capital and drive it out of the country; that people would have to shut up their country houses and curtail the area of employment for honest and industrious men; that the foreign millionaire would no longer make England his home, or, at any rate, the place of his death. None of these predictions has been verified by the event. It used to be said of a great landowner in the West of England, at the time of the repeal of the Corn Laws, that he was convinced that he was going to be ruined, and went about saying that he must make economies if he were to continue to live. After a time, a friend asked him what form his economies had taken, and he replied, "I have put down my pew." I am not at all sure that a revision of the death duties ever had so prejudicial an effect as that on the spiritual welfare of the upper classes. I doubt very much whether they have at all curtailed their contributions to the weekly offertory. But I am satisfied, after a great deal of investigation, that we may, without injury to property, without checking the accumulation of capital, and without injustice to any human being, reconsider the scale of duties imposed in 1904. I propose to leave the scale as it is up to £150,000. The unfortunate man who is unable to leave more than £150,000 will remain in exactly the same position as he is to-day. But when the principal value of the estate exceeds £150,000 and does not exceed £250,000, I propose that the rate of duty shall be 7 per cent. instead of 6½ per cent.; from £250,000 to £500,000 it shall be 8 per cent. instead of 7 per cent.; from £500,000 to £750,000, 9 per cent. instead of 7½ per cent.; from £750,000 to £1,000,000, 10 per cent. instead of 7½ per cent.; and when the estate exceeds £1,000,000, 10 per cent. on the first million. And here I introduce a new element, or what is called, in another connection, a super-tax. I propose that when a man's income exceeds £1,000,000—I do not know what we ought to do with such a man. When a man's estate which passes at his death exceeds £1,000,000, but does not exceed £1,500,000, I propose that it should pay 10 per cent. on the first million, and an additional 1 per cent., or 11 per cent. in all, upon the remainder; if the estate exceeds £1,500,000, and does not exceed £2,000,000, it will pay 10 per cent. on the first million and an additional 2 per cent., or 12 per cent. in all, on the amount in excess of £1,000,000; if it exceeds £2,000,000, and does not exceed £2,500,000, the tax will be as before, 10 per cent. on £1,000,000, but 13 per cent. on the balance; between £2,500,000 and £3,000,000 it will be 10 per cent. on £1,000,000, with 14 per cent. on the remainder, and above £3,000,000 everything in excess of the first million (which will still bear 10 per cent.) is to be taxed 15 per cent. There we stop. I need not point out, what I think must be clear to the Committee, that this applies not to the living, but to the dead. I shall be asked, of course, the pertinent question—and the answer to it will show the extreme moderation of my scheme—What addition will this make to the revenue of the country? Death Duties in former years were very uncertain, and therefore we must take an average. I estimate the average extra proceeds from the increased scale of Death Duties will be £1,200,000 a year. I ought to add that I propose that the new scale shall apply to all estates that pass by death after to-day. But it will be obvious to the Committee that, in consequence of the delay in winding up estates, the new scale will only operate practically for a few months of the present year. Therefore, for the present year, I think it is wise not to anticipate a larger receipt than £600,000 from this source; but the ultimate annual receipt I estimate at £1,200,000.

BALANCE SHEET.

I am now able to present a balance-sheet showing how I have dealt with the surplus up to this point. The surplus of revenue over expenditure is £3,233,000. If you add to that the addition to the Death Duties of £600,000 you bring it up to £3,833,000. The cost for the year of the proposed change on the income-tax is estimated at £2,000,000. This leaves a still disposable surplus of £1,833,000. The odd figure of £333,000 I will keep in hand for the contingencies of the year—not an excessive amount for the purpose. As regards the other £1,500,000 I propose to add it to the New Sinking Fund, making a fixed provision for the year of £29,500,000. Why do I do that? I have said I am not going to part with revenue, and I think the arrangements I have made are such as to show that I shall not suffer in revenue from the Budget proposals. I cannot part with this £1,500,000. I shall need the money for the future. I shall need it next year. In the meantime I make the best investment I can by diminishing pro tanto our national obligations. We recognise that the income-tax is a fiscal engine with which we cannot dispense. But we shall remove from it its greatest blot by giving effective relief in the form of a lower rate of charge to that class of incomes on which it presses most heavily. We shall have made a substantial, but not, as I have shown, an excessive addition to the toll which the State exacts from large estates which pass at death. We shall have fulfilled to a degree never attained, or even attempted, before on the same scale in any single year the discharge of debt.

Then in regard to the future. There are urgent, long-delayed, and overdue problems of social reforms; and we shall have begun to provide the nucleus of a fund for the relief of necessitous old age. I shall have in hand next year, free and earmarked for the purpose, the £1,500,000 to which I have just referred, together with the uncollected arrears of this year's income-tax, amounting to £750,000, which will make a total of at least £2,250,000, and an additional sum from the increased estate duties. I count with confidence on further economies in expenditure; and let me add, as time goes on, nowhere with more hope than in the department of expenditure for the relief of the poor. And if I expect economies from my colleagues I appeal for them with still more emphasis to this House. You cannot have everything at once, or everything together; but if you have set your purpose, as I believe you have, and as we have, on this greatest and most urgent of social reforms, you must be willing to sacrifice, or, at any rate, to postpone other forms of useful and even beneficent expenditure. Nor are the resources of taxation, within free trade, yet exhausted. I make no prophetic estimate as to the future. There must always be in our calculations a place for the unforeseeable and the unforeseen. There are what we call accidents, shiftings, mutations, and vicissitudes of fortune, from which States are no more exempt than are the men and women who compose them. But, subject to those necessary reservations, I ask the House to sanction proposals which are intended to open the gate and straighten the way to a better and brighter future for our people.

TEA.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Customs duty now charged on tea shall continue to be charged until the first day of July nineteen hundred and eight (that is to say) tea, the pound, 5d."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: It is almost superfluous on my part to praise the right hon. Gentleman on the merits of his speech, but I am sure I am speaking for the Whole House when I say that we have listened with pleasure to his statement, and with admiration to its form. But I am glad to think that I can go further than that and say that as to a considerable part of it at any rate I find myself in no great disagreement with the right hon. Gentleman either in his survey of the situation or some of the changes he proposes. I do not propose at this moment to examine in any detail the financial scheme he has unfolded, still less to follow in that way the statement which the right hon. Gentleman has just made, but I should like to make a few observations upon that statement. Let me say at the beginning that I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the credit of the country has been needlessly disparaged in some quarters, and that it is of course a patent fact that, when you allow for the change of the rate of interest, it not only stands to-day higher than that of any other country in the world, but that it stands higher than it did except on rare occasions in our own history. And, Sir, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that, having regard to present conditions, it is expedient and desirable that special provision shall be made for the reduction of Debt. I am not one of those who think the permanent provision which we have made, especially when it is strengthened with considerable sums coming from the old Sinking Fund is insufficient as a continuous charge, but I do think that in the circumstances of the present time there are special reasons why we should increase that charge. I rejoice that the right hon. Gentleman has utilised a portion of the surplus which he anticipates in the year now entered upon for the reduction of Debt, but I must say, because it is the first time I have had the pleasure of speaking in the right hon. Gentleman's presence on the matter, though I had a passage-of-arms with his right hon. friend on the War Estimates —I must say that I regret that the right hon. Gentleman abstracted £500,000 of what would have normally gone to the Sinking Fund for the purpose of carrying out the scheme adumbrated by the Secretary of State for War, for setting the Volunteers free from their liabilities, He intercepted that money which would have otherwise gone to the reduction of Debt, and the country remains burdened with debt from which, except for this extraordinary and unprecedented proceeding it would have been relieved. With another part of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals I am in complete sympathy, and I think I can promise him for myself and my friends, on the lines he has laid down, co-operation in dealing with the subject of local taxation, and his attempts to place the grants from Imperial taxation in favour of local rates, on a sound and substantial footing. Nothing could be more complicated or unsatisfactory than our system as it now stands, and as it has been described to the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman, and provided he takes care to secure that by his treatment the local authorities shall not be the losers either in the present or in the future, by the change that he proposes, I do not think he will meet with any opposition from this side. I hope he will go a little further and see whether it is not in the power of the Exchequer of the Government to secure some further control over the expenditure to which they contribute, or at any rate to see that the contributions they make go to the purposes for which they are intended. A grant is given and grants have been given over and over again in relief of local taxation, but have any local rates ever been more than momentarily reduced thereby? Is it not the common experience that within a short time of the contribution having been given to local taxation the rates have risen again to the height at which they were and even beyond that figure? There is no limit to local taxation except the limit put upon it by the patient or impatient ratepayer. It is worth considering whether in any change that is made in local taxation we can secure that the money given in relief of local taxation does go in reduction of taxation, and does not go towards encouraging local authorities in embarking in further unnecessary expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman has, as he said, made a statement covering a wider range than is usual on this occasion, and the Committee is the gainer by it. I thing it is a wise and prudent thing that we should from time to time take stock of our position, not merely as it affects one year but as it affects a series of years, as far forward as a Government or a Chancellor of the Exchequer may be expected to look. It is doubly necessary when the Chancellor of the Exchequer sees before him very heavy calls for new expenditure, and wishes to provide for new expenditure for which he cannot provide in the present year, but which he can only hope to provide for by gradually building up a fund with which to meet it. I do not think the review which the Chancellor of the Exchequer made of our resources is altogether an encouraging one, and it was at this part of his speech, no doubt necessary for purposes of his own, that the right hon. Gentleman quitted that dispassionate and non-partisan air which Chancellors of the Exchequer are apt to adopt in Budget speeches, and indulged in rhetoric and fireworks on the subject of free trade. I say "fireworks" because I do not wish to use a harsher phrase. I might borrow the phrase of the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies and say that the right hon. Gentleman indulged in terminological inexactitudes. What was the situation he disclosed? That there was an ever-growing demand for social reform; a demand the growth of which was typified by his illustration of what has happened in connection with our expenditure on education, which in a period of about thirty-five years has risen from under £750,000 to £25,000,000. I echo what the right hon. Gentleman said that so far as that money is spent in providing education for the children without extravagance, and without waste, there is not one of us who would wish to cut it down. But there may be there, as some of us think there is in other cases, some expenditure for which we do not get an adequate return. So far as it serves the purpose to which it is devoted there is not one of us who desires to reduce it or who believes it can be reduced if you are to make economy, because as fast as you make an economy other growths will come up. As it is with other social reforms, the inevitable tendency is to grow. They begin with a small figure and inevitably grow. What are the resources out of which we have to meet them? The right hon. Gentleman said the revenues of receipts of last year are in some respects curious. They certainly are. I think he might add that they are to some extent disquieting. The right hon. Gentleman's great increase is in the Death Duties, and as he said himself very fairly, though they tend to average themselves over a series of years they are very uncertain in any year, from the point of view not of the condition of the tax, but of the consideration of the tax as an engine of revenue. The right hon. Gentleman also said that last year was a year of singular prosperity in trade, of increased profits and of growing wages. I do not think the wages have grown very much hitherto, I am not quite sure in what sense the right hon Gentleman used the term. There has been some growth in employment, and therefore some increase of wages paid, but I do not think the Board of Trade Returns show a very marked increase in the wages paid, although there has been some movement in that direction. But the greater the prosperity, the greater the sum paid in wages, the greater you would expect the revenue to be in articles of Customs and Excise. But those Returns are not satisfactory. We do not see in the Customs and Excise the evidence of abundant wealth or widespread prosperity which the Chancellor of the Exchequer finds, I suppose, in a survey of other facts and figures. I think the lack of growth in these items is rather disquieting. It produces this result, that while the Chancellor of the Exchequer is anxious to reduce taxation and to provide funds for social reforms, he is obliged to say the second object kills the first, and he cannot offer any remission of taxation. That is the doctrine I and my friends have been preaching for years; but the right hon. Gentleman denounces his opponents for defending a course he himself continues to pursue. To the consumer it does not matter whether one Chancellor takes a revenue from tea or sugar or another Chancellor takes it from corn. We have admissions as to hopes for social reform—in particular, old-age pensions; but on grounds of statesmanship and fiscal stability, you ought not to attempt to cary out those great measures, principally for the benefit of the poorer amongst us, wholly at the expense of those who are better to do in the world. I think his admissions will be useful, and he will find that the scarecrow, with which he has for a time succeeded in frightening the people, will lose its effect the next time he waves it over the electoral field. As regards the right hon. Gentleman's proposal to graduate the income-tax by means of a super-tax or other taxes, I observe that he did not decline ever to look into the matter again, but he indicated, at any rate, clearly and succinctly, the very great difficulty which would attend the practical application of any proposal of the kind. What he proposes, I think, at first sight appeals to all of us. He takes extreme cases on either side, for the purpose of illustration. He takes the case of a man who has £1,000 a year derived from Consols, and the case of another man who has £1,000 a year derived from his personal exertions. He asks, is it fair that you should tax these two men on exactly the same basis? I think all of us will feel that it is desirable to make a distinction between these two cases, but there is a little doubt whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to make the tax much fairer by the proposal which he has put forward. He will remove certain anomalies, but I think he will not remove anomalies altogether; I think he will only change the anomalies which are perpetrated instead of removing them from the tax. I was rather surprised in this connection that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made no reference to the evidence given by the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue before the Income-Tax Committee—evidence remarkably interesting, full of thought and value, in particular that part of it which dealt not only with the attempt at graduation, but with the question of differentiation, which was carried out by the present combination of Death Duties with income-tax. The right hon. Gentleman said he would not go into the question of the Death Duties, or whether they were deferred income-tax or not. I confess I do not think they are. I think that properly they are anticipated income-tax, collected from the heir at the moment he enters on the inheritance, and he has to make that good during the time he is in enjoyment of the property, always assuming that he is prepared to maintain the profits of the property, and is not prepared to see them gradually wasting away. If that be so, the Death Duties are in fact anticipated income-tax. The income-tax is collected not from the dead man after his death, but from the heir in anticipation of his enjoying the income. The moment you take the Death Duties as well as the income-tax into account, you have already a great difference between the taxing of a man who is receiving £1,000 a year from Consols and the taxing of a man who is earning £1,000 a year from his own exertions. The capital sum represented by £1,000 a year from Consols is taxed for Death Duties, and is taxed when the capital passes again. The capital represented by a man's life and strength, that is to say, what gives effect to and enables him to make his personal exertions, is not taxed, but only such money as he may have laid by at the time. I admit, nevertheless, that it is very tempting to endeavour to make a distinction between earned and unearned income. I am not, however, at all sure that the right hon. Gentleman has succeeded in distinguishing fairly between them. I am not quite clear what he proposes to do with a certain large class of property which he himself did not mention, but which he will perhaps be good enough to refer to when he speaks later in the evening. Under what category does he treat pensions? Will the civil servant's pension, which he has earned by his labours for the State, but for which he has ceased to labour, be treated as earned or unearned income? What about life interests of any kind? What about annuities? Are they to be treated as earned or unearned income? From the point of view of the recipient they are not in the same position as the money received from personal exertions; that is to say, that from the point of view of the receiver the income dies when the person dies. Of course, those incomes are derived probably from permanent investments; it is only the interest of the living person that dies with his death; the permanent investment still exists, and the interest becomes someone else's. How does the right hon. Gentleman propose to deal with that? It is obvious that we are only at the beginning of the subject, and that before we part from it we shall have to go into all those cases.

Mr. ASQUITH: There will be the definition clause,

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: There will be a definition clause, but the right hon. Gentleman will have not merely to define, but to justify his definitions; he will not merely have to draw a line by putting it in one particular place rather than another. Again, I wish to refer to a very peculiar class of cases. How does the right hon. Gentleman propose to deal with income derived from land? I assume that he will treat the income of the farmer derived from land as earned income. But suppose the farmer is owner of the land, what will happen then? Is he going to treat as unearned the sum which you would assume to be the rent of the land if it were let, or is he going to treat the whole income as earned if it be farmed by the owner himself? Take the case of a man who is not farming his own land, but makes it his business to do the management of his estate himself, his income being £1,500 a year. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman would wish to answer me at once.

Mr. ASQUITH: It will be more convenient to answer these questions together.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I put the case of a man deriving an income of £1,500 a year from his estate, which he does not farm, but which he manages himself; that is his business; is that income earned or unearned? There must be an answer. Of course, our attitude towards the right hon. Gentleman's proposals must depend very much on his answer. I put two cases. I say the person having a life interest in certain property bringing in a certain sum ought to be treated in the same category as the person who is earning the same sum by his own exertions, because the income in each case is dependent on the life of the possessor and cannot be bequeathed by him to someone else. Then I take the case of a man who owns land, manages his own estate, and derives an income of £1,500 a year, or we will say a sum under £2,000 a year. Why not put him beside the man who is making a similar sum by devoting his time to a manufacturing business? I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman draws any distinction between them, or whether he is prepared, as I think he should be prepared, to treat both on exactly the same footing. No doubt he is considering these matters, and there are other cases about which we shall have to ask him and which he himself will have to consider. I come to the last of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals, the increase of the Death Duties. I do not at all meet him in an attitude of hostility in regard to increased graduation on great fortunes that we see falling in from time to time. I do not wholly agree with him as to all the effects prophesied or which followed from Sir William Harcourt's reform. I think he is mistaken. I think it has tended to remove a certain amount of capital out of this country, it has tended to shut up a certain number of big houses, at any rate temporarily, with the result of very considerable hardship primarily on their possessors, besides distress and disturbance of the whole country-side. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider, when he is still further graduating these Death Duties, whether he cannot make some distinction between the taxation of capital which is readily available and capital which is not readily available for its purposes. Nobody can contend that the owners of great estates with their capital invested in the land are in the same position as those who have their money invested in securities or business. Their obligations are much heavier, and the difficulty of realising any portion of their capital is much greater. I have often felt that Sir William Harcourt, when he introduced the death duties, might with very little sacrifice of revenue have alleviated the cases of great hardship which arose under them if he had been willing to do so; and I now ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can do something to relieve the worst cases of hardship under the present duties, which may be cases of even greater hardship under his new duties. I ask him to consider whether he cannot do this without sacrificing any substantial portion of the revenue he hopes to obtain. I said at the commencement of my remarks that I did not intend to go fully into the matters raised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-day. A statement of the character and scope of that of the right hon. Gentleman demands much further consideration than can be given to it by the speaker who follows him immediately in debate, and the Opposition will have other opportunities of pressing their views upon him, of examining his reforms, and eliciting information as to the changes he has proposed. For the present I know how limited are the resources with which the right hon. Gentleman is able to deal, how little scope he has, bound as he is, quite unnecessarily, by the declarations of the Party opposite —how little scope he has for enlarging his revenue, and how utterly insufficient is our present basis of taxation to provide the means required for the reforms which we all desired to see undertaken. Even when the right hon. Gentleman is prepared still further to increase the taxation on great fortunes and to increase direct taxation, it is obvious how utterly inadequate our present resources are to meet the needs of the State.

*Mr. GEORGE FABER (York), said there was at any rate no difference of opinion upon either side of the House amongst business men as to the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had dealt with the Sinking Fund and the reduction of the National Debt. Every hon. Member would realise that the late war put the National Debt into a very unfortunate, in fact a calamitous, position, and raised it by £150,000,000. The Sinking Fund was, of course, suspended during the war, but it had now been put upon its full working basis, and by that process the National Debt would be automatically reduced. They were all therefore very grateful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for restoring the Sinking Fund to a strong position and for carrying to it a further sum of a million and a half sterling from the estimated surplus for the coming year. This year, when the temptation to devote such a surplus to other and more fascinating objects must have been very great, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had sturdily turned his eyes away from such temptation and had added the money to the Sinking Fund. He noticed that there was one exception to the general prosperity, and that was the market for stock and securities. They had only to look round the whole purview of the stock markets to see the enormous shrinkage that had taken place. There had been a shrinkage of at least 25 per cent in the great stocks of the country. Consols in 1899, before the war in South Africa broke out, stood at 106, and now they stood at 86. The blue riband of railway investment stock, the London and North Western Railway 4 per cent. preference stock, stood at 140 before the war and now they stood at 115. There were many reasons for this fall. Why had Consols suffered this great drop? Partly owing to the late Lord Goschen's conversion scheme, which lowered the interest from 3 per cent. to 2¾ per cent. and later to 2½ per cent. At the time Lord Goschen's scheme was regarded as a great financial achievement, but the present position of Consols showed that it had been very disastrous from the point of view of the interests of the country. It was quite true that the national Exchequer saved ¼ per cent to begin with and was now saving ½ per cent., but it was possible to purchase that kind of economy too dearly. By reducing what was described by Lord Beaconsfield as "the sweet simplicity of the 3 per cents." to 2¾ and 2½ per cent. they had shaken out the small investors who were the backbone of Consols and who in the past had been relied upon in times of financial stress. The little men had gone, and who had taken their place? Largely the banks of the country and the Government itself. It was true that those now sitting in Opposition were responsible for the war, and they were quite willing to bear that responsibility. There was another contributing cause to the fall in all first-class stocks, and that was the immense increase which had taken place in municipal expenditure, which now stood at more than half the amount of the National Debt. Why should they be surprised if Consols and other great preference stocks and securities dropped when they continued to water down the whole of the stocks and securities of the country in this way? Then again there had been an immense fall in the value of mining shares in South Africa. Everybody who knew anything about the question of South African mines knew that the shares were held in small lots all over the world, often by people of little means, although no doubt the mines were initiated by capitalists. In the winter of 1904 the stocks of thirty-six of the chief companies stood at £156,000,000 while to-day they were valued at about one-half.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield) said that half of the companies had watered capital.

*MR. GEORGE FABER said that he knew the hon. Member's views on that topic. They were diametrically opposed to his own. He was pointing out that owing to the agitation against the mines, which had been most ill-advised from the point of view of finance, the value of the shares had fallen. The stocks of railway companies in this country had been immensely depreciated by threats made against them, and legislation apprehended in regard to licensed property had led to an enormous depreciation in the value of such property. He wished to say a few words in regard to a matter which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not touched upon, namely, the gold supply. There had been a great deal of recent discussion about the scarcity of gold and about the gold reserve. Gold was only a commodity just like corn or meat or other marketable articles. The reason why there had been a great scarcity of gold was that during the past year business had been active all over the world with the result that there had been an exceptional demand for gold, and there had not been enough gold to go round. [Cheers.] He was not surprised to hear the cheers of hon. Members below the gangway. He was afraid that the Budget would not make gold circulate any more freely in the direction hon. Members desired. On account of the activity of trade the supply of gold had not been sufficient. The view he had always taken was that this country being still a creditor country only really required gold as a medium of internal exchange, and owing to her cheque system did not require the amount of gold for the transaction of business that some countries required. There had been a cry in many quarters about increasing the gold reserve, but he ventured to think that no such expedient was required.

*The CHAIRMAN: I really do not see the relevancy of these remarks even on a subject so wide as that now before the House.

*Mr. GEORGE FABER thought that, money being the basis of the Budget, he would not be altogether out of order in making some general remarks on that subject. He had the honour of being a member of the Committee which inquired into the question of the income-tax. They all learned a great deal from the inquiries of the Committee, and he did not think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal of differentiation would be disagreeable to any Member who sat on the Committee. But he ventured to think that it would not be found anything like so easy as was imagined to work out the scheme of differentiation which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated to the House. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted the late Mr. Gladstone's objection to differentiation, but that objection applied with equal force now. The right hon. Gentleman did not meet the case at all. The widow's grievance referred to by Mr. Gladstone remained. He instanced the case of a widow with an unearned income of £300 a year, and the case of a grocer with an earned income of the same amount. The widow under the present system of abatements got the benefit of an abatement, but she would not get any differentiation under the new scheme, whereas the grocer got both the abatement and the differentiation. The right hon. Gentleman had not at all got over Mr. Gladstone's objection. Let them look at the matter from another point of view. In the case of a mixed income—partly earned on capital and partly by personal effort—how were they going to differentiate? Cases of that kind could be multiplied, but he would take the case of a doctor who earned £1,000 a year. The doctor had bought the business, and in respect of the capital which he had paid his income would be unearned, while in respect of the personal effort he put into the business his income would be earned. Who was going to differentiate between the two? In the case of any trader who had bought a business with his capital, who was to decide how much of the income was earned and how much was unearned? Was the collector to decide how much of an income was unearned and how much came from personal endeavour? It would give rise to an infinite number of appeals. He was rather sorry to hear the right hon. Gentleman almost laugh at the hardships caused by the higher scale of Death Duties introduced by the late Sir William Harcourt. But apart altogether from millionaires, they all knew that there was a great intermediate class that had been most grievously burdened by those Duties. Let them take the case of a landed estate worth £150,000 on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to increase the Death Duties. It should be remembered that there might be large charges on that estate for the widow and the younger children and very little ready money with which to pay the Duties, thus necessitating a heavy burden of mortgage upon the estate. He did not think any increase on that class of estate was just. The millionaire was supposed to be fair game. That was true from one point of view; but it must not be forgotten that the millionaire was quite as necessary for the financial stability of this country as any other class. Some millionaires might have made their money by their own exertions. There were more who were made, perhaps, than born. The Chancellor of the Exchequer laughed at the idea that the Death Duties drove capital out of the country; but he maintained that that charge was true. Hitherto capital had found comparative security in this country. Capital was a shy bird, a cosmopolitan bird, having no country, but building its nest where it could best find security. If that security was destroyed, capital would go. He doubted whether it was good policy from the individual or the national point of view to increase the Death Duties. It was pointed out by Sir Henry Primrose in his evidence before the Select Committee that the Death Duties worked out on an average at an equivalent to an extra 1s. in the pound income-tax and on millionaire estates to an extra 2s. in the pound.

Mr. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.) asked whether the pensions of Civil servants or of naval and military officers would be regarded as deferred pay or accumulated savings? He thought that the duty should have been taken off sugar, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was hardly correct in saying that to take off a small sum from that duty would have had no effect on consumption.

Mr. ASQUITH said he was open to argument as to whether for the purposes of the income-tax pensions should be treated as deferred pay or accumulated savings. That was one of the questions which was discussed by economists in both aspects. He himself was disposed to regard pensions in the light of accumulated savings. A farmer who earned his income would be entitled to pay income-tax at the rate of 9d. instead of 1s. in the £1 if his income was under £2,000 a year.

Mr. GEORGE FABER asked what about the landlord who acted as his own agent?

Mr. ASQUITH said that in the case of a landlord who farmed his own land or acted as his own agent he had to make out his return; and it was for him to show that he was entitled to the low rate because his income was earned.

Mr. SAMUEL ROBERTS (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said he would like to join with the late Chancellor of the Exchequer in offering his congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman on his Budget statement. He believed that a great part of that Budget would be approved of and give satisfaction in the country. The right hon. Gentleman did nothing for indirect taxation. That was good, because last year indirect taxation had been reduced. Something had been taken off the duties on sugar, tea, and corn, but nothing had been taken off the income-tax, although the right hon. Gentleman had associated himself with the opinion of his predecessor that it was impossible to justify or defend an income-tax of 1s. in the pound in a time of peace. However, his first criticism of the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that he ought to have made a general reduction of the income-tax from 1s. in the pound. He was quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman's proposal to reduce the income-tax to 9d. only in certain cases would not have been approved of by Mr. Gladstone, who always regarded that tax as a temporary and not a permanent tax. On one occasion Mr. Gladstone proposed that the income-tax should be imposed for only seven years, and in 1873 that it should be taken off altogether. He contended that the income-tax payers in the country with incomes below £700 had borne more than their fair share of the burden of the war taxation, and at present direct taxation for war expenditure amounted to £15,000,000, and indirect taxation to only £8,000,000. He knew that the right hon. Gentleman said that he would devote the large sum of £1,500,000 to the Sinking Fund, and they were naturally pleased that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should keep that fund up. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to propose to pay off £13,700,000 odd and in addition this £1,500,000 was to be paid into it, so that £15,200,000 was to be devoted to that purpose. He understood however, that this payment of £1,500,000 into the Sinking Fund would not bind the Government to its allocation to the purpose of reduction of Debt next year, the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer being to form a nucleus of a fund for old-age pensions. He entirely agreed with the basis the right hon. Gentleman had laid down as to this question, viz., that it must be approached step by step, and that they could not at once launch the country into extravagant expenditure. He also agreed that this benefit should be given to persons who were suffering through no fault of their own. It seemed to him that the only safe way to proceed was for the State to contribute a certain amount which should be met by the contribution of a similar sum by the local authorities. On the whole he thought the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was highly satisfactory.

*Mr. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not taken another penny off the tea duty this year. No article had a greater claim upon a Chancellor of the Exchequer, because it was to a large extent raised by British capital in British possessions, and the use of it also forwarded the cause of temperance, while it was the comfort, little luxury, and indeed necessity of the poor. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consider that, as they had not had the penny remission this year, it was owing to the tea consumers in Great Britain and planters in India and Ceylon, who were our fellow countrymen, to take off 2d. next year. As the right hon. Gentleman had said, the price went up last year, but that was because of the failure of the crops and the depletion of the stores of retailers in anticipation of the Budget. The price of the cheaper teas ran up, he believed, to as much as 3d. a pound more. Another reason for the increase was the active enterprise of those engaged in the tea industry in India, who had endeavoured to develop the German and Russian markets. He himself had taken part in that movement though he had not a penny piece invested in tea. There were other parts of the world, like Finland, where at present coffee was mainly used, but in which tea had only to be introduced to create a trade. If this additional 1d. had been taken off it would have led to a great development of the industry, and have employed more British capital and labour. Another fact was that owing to the large tax which had prevailed in the last few years planters had been discouraged from extending cultivation, and this coupled with the expansion of the market had led to the high price of tea, to the great disadvantage of the poor people of this country. He had hoped that the Chancellor would have taken these matters into account, because if the penny was of no value to the consumer, and did not reach him, as was argued, and the boon which he gave last year was on that account wasted, there was the more reason for a decrease, and what was wanted now was the extra penny to make the boon efficacious. He would not go at greater length into the question of tea, because a memorial had been circulated among Members for which he was in part responsible. He wished however to call attention to the pensions of British officers and civil servants, and would strongly urge that they should be regarded as earned income and deferred pay, and not as accumulated savings handed over by the employers on retirement, and thus come under the lower rate as to income-tax. These people had often had very little pay and were often hard put to it to maintain themselves and their wives and to educate their children. They had been accustomed to some comfort and to a certain position, and he put it strongly that their pensions should come under the most favourable rate. As to the man with an income of £2,000 a year, would he enjoy the more favourable rate in respect of any portion of it which he earned?

MR. ASQUITH: If his income exceeds £2,000 a year he will not enjoy anything.

*MR. REES said he understood that as to the £1,500,000 which was to be placed in the Sinking Fund and was to be the nucleus of a fund for old-age pensions the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to take it out next year or to ear-mark it for this specific purpose.

MR. ASQUITH: I have no power to take it out. I only propose to devote it to that purpose if the House agrees. If they do it will be for Parliament to take it out.

*MR. REES: Yes; but Parliament had power with the Exchequer and the Chancellor had Power with Parliament, and he did not altogether understand how this sum was secured for this purpose. When his hon. friend opposite was speaking he made some remarks which met with considerable disapproval on the Ministerial side. The hon. Gentleman pointed out that the capital of the gold mines in South Africa was was now distributed among a great many small investors of this country and was not the property of capitalists in South Africa. That was true, and he desired to take that opportunity of expressing his concurrence with a statement which any one who would take the trouble to go to the city might verify for himself. There could be no doubt, moreover, that the competition between the Government and the municipalities on the one hand and private traders on the other must lead to dislocation and difficulty in regard to labour and industry in this country. For instance, if it was right for the Government to give employment as a matter of relief rather than as a matter of business in a particular constituency, such as Woolwich, then it was right and proper to give such employment in other constituencies where there were no Royal Arsenals, one of which was the Montgomery district. There was no justice in giving to one constituency what was not given to another, and the public purse was the property of all constituents.

Sir F. BANBURY (City of London) said he wished first to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman in being able to devote £1,500,000 to the sinking fund, because when the country was in funds as it was at present was the time to do so; it could not be done when we had no money. The right hon. Gentleman had given some reasons for the deplorable state of affairs which he said existed in the stock markets, but there were other reasons which the right hon. Gentleman did not recognise, or at all events did not put before the House. The right hon. Gentleman said the Radicals were pledged to restore the national credit, and referred to wild talk in the newspapers on the price of Consols, and then said that 2½ per cent. stock at 82 was equal to 3 per cent. stock at 100. He quite agreed that there had been about the national credit a lot of wild talk which was not justified, but that was not the argument used by the right hon. Gentleman a year ago. When that argument was used by the Unionist Party the price of Consols was 85, and it was only after the advent of the right hon. Gentleman as Chancellor of the Exchequer that they touched a lower point than they ever touched when the Unionists were in power. Although there was a good deal of point in the contention that the credit of the country had not materially suffered, he did not think the Party of the right hon. Gentleman had redeemed their pledge to restore the national credit. The right hon. Gentleman said that fresh issues had a great deal to do with it; that the trust list had been extended and Colonial securities had been admitted, and that excessive borrowing of municipalities had a great deal to do with it. All that was true, because as they returned a higher interest than Consols, the tendency was to sell Consols and put the money into municipal and Colonial stocks. He did not quite see how the right hon. Gentleman brought in the catastrophe in America, because although it was suggested that a number of stocks were going to be sold by the insurance companies he did not think that ever occurred. The fall in Consols had been going on for some years. The right hon. Gentleman had also alluded to Irish land stock, which certainly affected the price of Consols. And it should not be forgotten that while the right hon. Gentleman had reduced the National Debt by £13,000,000 he had issued large amounts of Irish land stock which was just as much a part of the National Debt as Consols. He admitted that the right hon. Gentleman was not really responsible for the issue of Irish land stock. He himself voted against the issue of stock for the purchase of Irish land, and he believed that if the thing had been done properly no special stock would have been issued but Consols. What was the use of buying up Consols which paid £2 16s. per cent. and issuing Irish land stock at £3 5s. per cent. That represented a loss of 9s. to the taxpayer, and such a proceeding could not be justified by any principle of sound finance. Another reason for the drop in Consols and other securities generally was that at one time people were content to invest in English securities because they thought that though the interest was low the security was undeniable, and they would not invest in foreign securities because they thought the security was not so good. He was sorry to say that owing to the action of the Party opposite there was a strong impression in the minds of people who had money that it was better to invest it out of England. That was another reason for the fall in Consols, as he was able to prove. It was a fact well known to every stockbroker in the City of London. He asked the right hon. Gentleman in all seriousness to investigate that statement, and, if he found it was true, to do something to strengthen stocks in the stock market and do away with that want of confidence which prevailed in the case of English stocks. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman was going to put employers to the trouble of stating the wages paid to all their employees, because it would put a very great tax upon them, especially on such companies as railway companies, who employed sometimes as many as 20,000 men. It would entail very great labour.

MR. ASQUITH said the idea was not his. he had taken it from Lord Ritchie.

SIR F. BANBURY said that everybody was liable to make mistakes, and Lord Ritchie was as liable as anyone else. As this was not the idea of the right hon. Gentleman he hoped he would not persist in it. They must not forget also that the income-tax was instituted as a war tax, and that it was desirable from the Government's point of view to keep it as low as possible in order that they might have a little in reserve for times of emergency. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the points that had been put to him.

*MR. CHARLES ROBERTS (Lincoln) said he wished to draw attention to the statement of the Chancellor of the Excheqer that the decline in the consumption of alcoholic liquors, of which he told them last year, had now suffered a check, and that there had been a slight but distinct set back. The drink Bill had gone up some £2,000,000 in the last year. The effect of his statement last year in which he traced the decline of the drink Bill from the year 1899 onward was to produce in the minds of many Members and of the country as a whole the sense that everything was going on all right, that all was for the best in the best of all possible licensing worlds, and that this very difficult problem might be left to settle itself. However, if they took a retrospect of ten years, this diminution practically disappeared, and if they went back further, it would be found that they were drinking more to-day than they did, say forty years ago. It was impossible to leave this question on one side, and he felt convinced that the Government did not mean to leave it undealt with. Now, some of them had been looking to the Budget statement with eyes of hope, and they were glad that there was going to be the alteration in the licence duties under which they would be recovered for the National Exchequer, and no longer go for the relief of local rates. That was, administratively, a great improvement, and they were glad that the step was going to be taken. At the present time, in some cases, local authorities could get £5,000 or £7,000 on the grant of new licences, in relief of rates, and it was very desirable indeed that that temptation should be taken away from the local authorities, and that these sums, which really were not due so much to local action as to the general policy of the State, should be recovered for the Exchequer. But they could not help wishing that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had seen his way to go further in the matter. The case was overwhelming for a revision of the licence duties. When Mr. Gladstone introduced the revision of the licence duties in 1880, he based it on the principle that Parliament had been engaged for years past in bolstering up monopolies and in adding to the artificial value which attached to public-house property, and which in his opinion were the most deadly and inveterate enemies with which temperance reformers had to deal. The principle referred to by Mr. Gladstone in 1880, after the act of 1904 which for the first time recognised a continuing interest in the licence, would in itself have justified a further revision, and a much more severe graduation of the licence duties. Many temperance reformers had altered their view in reference to that matter. In the past they were suspicious of raising more revenues from this trade; but now that the State, by the Act of 1904, recognised a continuing interest in the licence, it was borne in upon the minds of temperance reformers that the charging of a real licence duty and not the sort of peppercorn rent charged at the present time, would have a substantial effect in reducing the excessive number of licences, and especially that undesirable class of licences, which were merely on the margin of subsistence, and might very properly be put an end to. That was the reason why some of them were anxious for this revision of the duties. But under this Budget, at all events, they could not get the Reforms which might have come out of the revision of the duties. The Chancellor of the Exchequer held out hopes that it might come next year. "Man never is but always to be blessed." Some of them were tired of endless postponement, and he would like to convey to the mind of the Government that there was a growing feeling of impatience and anxiety at the delay in dealing with the question of temperance reform. If nothing could be done in the Budget there was increased urgency for dealing with the question by other means, and he hoped that the Government would, in framing their plans for the coming session, bear in mind that so far nothing had been done to redeem the strong assurance given by the Prime Minister last year that he would grapple with the problem of licensing reform. One further reflection occurred to him. If the duties were not revised this year, they retained at least in their hands a weapon over which the House of Commons had complete control. Licensing reforms were usually bitterly attacked, and, so far as legislation was concerned, they knew that the House of Commons had not complete control as it had over matters of taxation; he did not, however, think that the licensing reforms of the Government, when they were finally proposed, would suffer shipwreck in another place, but if that did happen, he hoped that the Government would not scruple when the time came to use their power over taxation, by which, at all events, they could accomplish some small instalments of temperance reform which had been so long delayed.

*MR. VICTOR CAVENDISH (Derbyshire, W.) said that though they had heard a clear statement from the right hon. Gentleman, yet he must confess that it was not satisfying, and it left a great deal over to another occasion. So far as he was able to judge, after listening to the statement, they were already confronted with an expenditure of £119,000,000, and there seemed no prospect in the near future of any reduction of that expenditure. On the contrary, the right hon. Gentleman was unable to give them any hope of a reduction of taxation; he had to keep all he had got, and probably there might be further inroads on the taxpayers in future. A considerable amount of legislation had been promised, and only a very small proportion of it had yet been placed before the House. The general experience now was that legislation usually meant money. None but Members of the Government knew anything about the proposed legislation. Two important Bills for Ireland were named in the King's Speech, and they did not know whether they would involve any charge upon the taxpayers or simply mean a reallocation of sums already voted. Then there was the proposal of the Secretary for War, whose scheme for a Territorial Army must prove very costly, and he would like to know what provision had been made with regard to that. With reference to the principal point of the Budget, he thought the right hon. Gentleman was to be congratulated on the intention to recover the licences into his own hands. With regard to the new proposals which the right hon. Gentleman had laid before the House making a differentiation in the death duties, he would like him to consider seriously whether something could not be done to give a further reduction in the case of estates, where the greater part of the owner's income might be derived from land. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a little too sanguine when he ridiculed some of those prophecies which were put forward when Sir William Harcourt introduced his great reform. He believed that the death duties had caused the withdrawal of a certain amount of capital, and undoubtedly there had been a tendency in many places, if not to close estates, to spend less money upon their development than would have been the case but for the heavy burdens which had been placed upon them. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider the various classes of property which had to bear these heavy burdens, and that he would be able to make a differentiation in favour of landed estates. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on what he had done with regard to the income-tax, and still more on what he had not done. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, he hoped, would not depart from the lines which he had laid down. With regard to the super-tax he was pleased that the right hon. Gentleman had not finally made up his mind, and that he had left the principle of the graduation of the income-tax to be dealt with upon some other occasion. He hoped that during the interval any consideration he might give to these questions would not induce him to make any departure from the lines he had laid down. The imposition of a super-tax must entail a full declaration in regard to all incomes from whatever source, and that course would not only be resented, but it might prove extremely disastrous to the tax as a whole. He would advise those hon. Members who expected to see a large amount of revenue raised through a graduation of the income-tax to read the admirable memorandum presented to the Committee by the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue. The idea of graduation had a certain amount of attraction about it, but when it was examined in detail and thoroughly threshed out it would be found not only that it would prove very irksome to the country, but that it would have a most disastrous effect upon the revenue. To draw distinctions between the various classes of income-tax payers was open to considerable objection. He did not know any distinction which would not be open to some objection, but from the experience which he gathered on that Committee and from the evidence which they heard he thought the line the Chancellor of the Exchequor had taken was the one least open to objection. On the whole it was the fairest, and although there must and would be innumerable hard cases, still he was of opinion that if the House of Commons was determined to adopt any distinctions of that character that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had drawn was perhaps the best. They would, of course, wait to see his definition clause before offering further criticism, and they would have to discuss further the Budget as a whole. In conclusion he wished to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon not having allowed himself in dealing with the income-tax to be led away from really sound principles of finance by any plans however attractive they might seem.

Mr. ASQUITH suggested that the Committee should pass the non-contentious Resolutions, and that the general discussion should be taken on Monday, when the Resolutions relating to income-tax, death duties, or local taxation were brought up.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN thought that was a fair offer, and he had no objection to that course being taken.

*Mr. C. E. PRICE (Edinburgh Central) asked whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended that the notices issued for the collection of the income-tax should be issued in September in Scotland. He thought that course would cause a great deal of difficulty, and if there could be some intimation that the notices would not be issued until after the payment of the November term rent it would prevent a great deal of trouble. These notices in Scotland were different from those issued in England, and, if without giving the exact words, the right hon. Gentleman would assure them that those notices would be issued in precisely the same form in England as in Scotland, they would feel no injustice. With regard to the tea duty, he was glad that there had not been a reduction of one penny per pound, because he thought it was a mistake last year to take off a penny. When the tea duty was reduced only by a penny the consumers did not receive any benefit at all. The primary object of the House of Commons in dealing with such questions ought to be to see that whenever a reduction was made it was done in such a way as to ensure that it did benefit those who were intended to be benefited. With regard to taxes on food, he did not gather that even next year the Chancellor of the Exchequer held out no hope that any changes would be made. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had laid the foundation for a complete alteration in the finances of the country, and he congratulated him upon his proposals. He approved of the alteration suggested in the system of local taxation, but he was not in favour of giving grants in aid.

*Colonel R. WILLIAMS (Dorsetshire, W.) said the right hon. Gentleman had spoken a good deal about the solid and growing prosperity of the country. He wished he could feel as optimistic as the right hon. Gentleman did as to the probability of that prosperity lasting. He thought there was a great deal which was not so solid in our trade as could be wished, and a good many of the symptoms in the country did not portend the continued prosperity for which they all hoped. When talking of his scheme of social reform, the right hon. Gentleman, he was glad to hear, paid due regard to the importance of character as a basis of the prosperity of the country. He welcomed those words as representing the considered opinions of His Majesty's Government, because they would tend to allay a good deal of alarm as to what might be called social reforms, which might possibly alter some of our social conditions, and certainly not improve the prospects of the country, by leading rather to dependence on Government than on one's own force and strength of character. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would carry out his scheme of old-age pensions. He himself had always been an advocate of old-age pensions. He had watched the driving power in favour of old-age pensions gradually growing, and he was glad to think that it was coming near the time when they would be able to accomplish something, though he hoped it would not be all that was expected in some quarters. The great difficulty to his mind in regard to old-age pensions was the fear of sapping self-reliance and lessening the inducement to lay by in younger years. He therefore specially welcomed what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said about self-reliance in all schemes of social reform. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would carry out the principle of self-reliance in another matter which he mentioned. He congratulated him on having the boldness to deal with the local taxation account. While that account was well conceived in intention, its use had been so altered that it had been nothing but an incubus to our national finance. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman in granting subventions to local authorities would lay down that the grants would depend on whether it appeared from their management of their affairs that the local authorities deserved them. One of the great merits of the scheme propounded by the Committee on the Reform of Local Taxation, presided over by Lord Balfour of Burleigh, was that the amount of the subventions from the Consolidated Fund to local authorities would be regulated by their deserving them, the subventions being larger with the poverty of a district as proved by the smallness of the amount produced by a penny rate, and with the economy with which the local affairs were administered, as proved by the lowness of the poor rate. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated in the course of his speech that war taxes ought to be applied to the paying off of war debt. He was sure all Members of the House agreed in that. The right hon. Gentleman had further stated that the war taxes produced at present about £20,000,000. If that was so, the right hon. Gentleman had fallen away from his own dictum, for in this year he had been paying off only £15,000,000. Like the right hon. Gentleman, he was very much in favour of the reduction of Debt, but he was not sure that he agreed with what was proposed to be done this year. One plan which the right hon. Gentleman had proposed for the alteration of the incidence of the income-tax, removed the burden from only a small portion of the number of the taxpayers. It would relieve part of the burden from about 210,000 payers of the tax out of about 850,000, or not quite a quarter. It had been stated that this would absorb some £600,000; in addition to which £1,500,000 were paid off the Debt. But these two sums together amounted to £2,100,000, or nearly 1d. on the income-tax, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had remitted the 1d. from the whole of the payers of the tax, he would have provided a larger reserve in case of need in the ability to reimpose the penny. He would not go into all the difficulties in regard to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme of differentiation. He thought the principle of making a differentiation between earned and unearned income was as sound as any differentiation could be—probably more sound and defensible than most, if not all, the others. Of course it would lead to a great many difficulties. He imagined that the greatest difficulty would be in the framing of the definition clause in the Budget Bill dealing with this question. He thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the tardy act of justice he had done to a long-suffering class, namely, the beneficed clergy, whose incomes were to be included in the category of earned incomes. There was no doubt that they were freeholders; they were so in right of service, and the amount of their freehold was therefore really earned income. The freeholds were granted in very many cases to the parishes to provide for their spiritual needs. As to the taking of 3d., in the pound off incomes which were earned, he wanted to know whether that was to be a fixed sum. If the income-tax was reduced to 10d. would the earned incomes be taxed at 7½d.? In other words, was the tax on earned incomes always to be 25 per cent. less than that on unearned incomes? If that was so, there was another difficulty which would have to be met. They never dealt with halfpennies in connection with the income-tax, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted to increase the tax it would have to be by 4d. at a time. He did not quite know why the differentiation should be 3d., but if that was to be a fixed sum those who were entitled to it would bear a larger proportion of the burden than those who were not entitled to it in the event of the tax being increased to (say) 1s. 3d. in the pound, and a smaller proportion than their share if it was reduced below 1s.

*MR. SCOTT (Ashton-under Lyne) said he regretted very much that no relief had been given in respect of sugar. In addresses up and down the country, and in answer to deputations, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed himself as freely as any Member of the House on the iniquity of the sugar tax. In a speech delivered to a deputation the right hon. Gentleman said it could only be a temporary tax, and that it would not be made a permanent impost. In the speech delivered to-day the right hon. Gentleman had outlined a scheme of old-age pensions which would come on twelve months hence. He could only conceive of that, and other beneficial measures, being carried out by making the tax on sugar permanent. If that was so, it meant the breaking of pledges which had been made right and left in the country. The sugar tax was put on as a war tax. He agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that after a war they could not pay off the debt all at once. He contended, however, that sugar was just as deserving of relief as tea. [AN HON. MEMBER: More.] He entirely differed from the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to the sugar duty and its reduction. There would not be the slightest difficulty in either the wholesale, retail, or manufacturing trade. Every grocer and storekeeper regulated the quality and price of his sugar to a farthing in the lb., and if the sugar duty were reduced one half, the price would be reduced in every shop in the country by a farthing in the lb. Again, the tax on sugar was out of all proportion to its value, amounting to from 35 to 40 per cent., which was a tremendous tax on food and on the raw material of many industries. So much had the tax on sugar been felt that prosperous industrial concerns depending very largely on sugar as the raw material of their manufactures had ceased to pay dividends; and labour employed in these industries, some of them of great magnitude, had suffered very materially. The tax affected not only sugar itself, but a thousand and one articles which were brought to this country. For instance, there was a tax on tins of fruit according to the sugar in them. Then there was the Custom House inspection, which disorganised business. He had seen a gentleman in the lobby that day who told him that the sugar tax put him to an expense of £6,000 a year in a department dealing with the Customs, an expense which he could not possibly get out of his customers. He hoped when the Chancellor of the Exchequer came to reply he would give them to understand that he was not going to look forward to this tax being made permanent. He knew that the directors of great industries in which many millions were locked up, and which were not paying one per cent. on the capital invested, would look at this Budget with great disappointment.

*MR. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry) said that he could not recall a previous occasion on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked the House to agree to his Budget Resolutions after only two hours debate. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman was quite fair to the members of the Select Committee on Income-Tax when he said they had practically agreed that it was desirable that they should differentiate the income-tax. He could not think that, because that was not within the terms of their reference which directed them to consider the practicability, not the desirability of it. He would have preferred that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not gone into the scheme of graduation which he had submitted, not because he objected to graduation, but because the scheme would create a large amount of work for the officials without any certainty of that work's being productive. He would have preferred if the right hon. Gentleman had confined graduation and differentiation to the death duties, especially on large estates. There were one or two regrettable omissions from the Budget speech to which he wished to call attention. Last year the Government were prepared to spend a million on what they described as education, although that million would have been devoted entirely to destroying denominational education in voluntary schools. If the Government were as interested in education as they professed to be, he would have looked to their forwarding the interests of education in the country apart from denominational teaching. He maintained that education required further assistance from the Treasury. He had always held that the Bill of 1902 formed an educational ladder by which the children of the poor could climb from elementary to higher education; and to some extent it had fulfilled that idea. But the reason why it had not been more successful was that the duty of providing scholarships was left far too much to local enterprise rather than to contributions from the Imperial Exchequer. The burden consequently fell more heavily on the poorer counties. To his mind it was a mistake in principle that that ladder should be dependent on the local rates rather than on grants from Parliament, and he would have been very glad if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given this year £500,000 to found scholarships in the poorer counties for poor children so as to make the Act of 1902 more effective. There was an entire omission from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of any reference to the important agricultural industry. A year ago, there was a very fine sentence in the King's Speech, setting out that His Majesty's Government were considering proposals for attracting people to the land, and retaining them upon it. Those proposals did not amount to very much, and this year it was only in the last item but one in the King's Speech that reference was made to a small measure for an alteration of the law affecting small holdings. Looking to the fact that it was almost universally admitted that agriculture bore a higher amount of taxation than any other industry, it could not be expected that people would be attracted to the land, until the land received some relief from taxation. They could not be content with vague proposals. There was no proposal to relieve local taxation further than it had been relieved, and there was no proposal to give any money towards the increase of small holdings. There was another question in connection with the land which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had left out of account, and that was the position of the owners of agricultural land with regard to their assessment for the purposes of income-tax. They had for many years suffered from very great injustice in that respect. For some reason or other the Party opposite never felt themselves in a position to see justice done to anyone who called himself a landlord, and it did not appear likely this year at any rate from what they had heard, unless there had been an omission from the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, that justice was going to be done. The rural landlord, the man who possessed, say, nothing whatever except agricultural land, and that perhaps of no great value in the way of letting, was paying far more in income-tax than any other kind of income-tax payer in proportion to what he had received. There was an arbitrary deduction from his assessment of one-eighth in respect of agricultural land, and the deduction was one-sixth in regard to houses. The latter for a landlord in a town might be a reasonable deduction, but for a landlord in a country district it was absolutely unreasonable and unfair. He did not believe that they could find one landlord in ten in country districts who did not spend more than one-eighth of his gross income upon his property, and he netted nothing like seven-eighths of his total income. Not one of these country landlords had a desire to escape from paying his fair share of the taxation of the country and paying the same share as other people paid. He did not think that anyone could say that the country squire was less patriotic than any other class in the country. He was ready to to pay his fair share, but because he was willing to do so was no reason why justice should not be done to him in this case. It could be done in this way if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree to it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he thought it would be an admirable thing if everybody made a declaration of his total income from all sources, and he expressed his keen desire that it should be done by them all, although he said he did not think that it was likely that everybody would do it. At any rate, the owners of agricultural land would have no objection whatever to make that declaration, and he thought it would be only fair to allow them the opportunity of being assessed on the net income which they got out of the land. The best landlords spent most in keeping their property in good order and in doing what they could to help their tenants; and if their property contained a number of small holdings they had to pay more out of their income than other landlords. If the Government were going to say that the man who did most for his land and most for his tenants was to pay more income-tax than anyone else, they would be endorsing a principle which was unjust, and was becoming more unjust every day. If one-eighth was a fair proportion the Government would get a statement to that effect from those who made a declaration of their income, but a vast proportion of the rural landlords spent a great deal more than that, something more like one-half, not in improving their property, but simply in preventing its deterioration. These people ought to be assessed on the money which they pocketed just as much as other people, and justice which had been too long delayed ought to be done to them in the Budget which had been brought in that day. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consider these points he would have his support to his Budget, which in many ways he admired very much, but he thought the right hon. Gentleman had a great opportunity at a time like the present and in a Budget which had received support from all quarters of the House, of redressing these absolutely incontestable grievances which would no doubt have been removed but for the idea that no Liberal Government could do anything in the way of justice for anyone who called himself a landlord.

*Mr. MADDISON (Burnley) said it was necessary to find a justification for a Budget which did nothing to repeal indirect taxation, especially in the case of sugar, which was both a food and a raw material. The tax on sugar operated in an injurious way in both directions, and he confessed he waited for the declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that point with considerable interest. He had not, however, the slightest difficulty in finding a justification for the Budget, in spite of the non-remission of any indirect taxation, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made it perfectly plain that he was not bringing forward a showy Budget, the chief claim of which would be for the moment to be called popular, but that he was attempting to reorganise our national finance on a sound basis. For many years he had taken a good deal of interest in the promotion of old age pensions on the lines suggested by Mr. Charles Booth, and it was because he was a convinced opponent of State socialism that he had always felt that there was a real case for dealing with the aged poor who, through various causes, found themselves—not by any means all of them helpless, but in such a condition that public money might well be devoted to succouring them in the twilight of their lives. There was a good deal of vague talk indulged in by all classes, including the working classes, who got hold of huge figures and said that with all this wealth surely the Government could bring forward at once an old-age pension scheme. He knew it would be said that the rich had been looked after and the poor had been neglected. Although he had never handled large sums of money, he was sufficiently acquainted with these things to know that national finance had a direct bearing upon the trade of the country, and, after all, the first consideration was to get national finance sound, so that the trade of the country in the operative part of a man's life should also be prosperous. He wished to say he regarded the Budget—much as he would have liked to have seen a remission of the sugar tax or part of it, and much as he would have liked to have seen this year old-age pensions established—as one which would be welcome to the great mass of the people and one which he could support without apology or qualification, because the Chancellor had united two things, namely, sound national finance and social reform. This was the first Budget in which there had ever been a distinct pledge on the part of the Government to introduce during the life of this Parliament and even in the next session, if another House would leave them alone — a measure under which a start would be made with a scheme of old-age pensions. He ventured to say that no reasonable man, and one need not trouble about unreasonable men, could expect more in the second session of a Parliament than that which they had been offered that afternoon. A good many of them felt so strongly about old-age pensions that in order to secure them they would be prepared to assist the Government in resisting every fanciful scheme which might come into hon. Members' heads and which they thought might make the people better. There was no piece of social amelioration which had so solid a backing, not only by the working classes but by tradesmen and others who had realised that there was no more pressing need than old-age pensions, and they would support the Government in pressing forward this scheme. If, however, the Government embarked upon artificial methods of keeping the people unemployed in farm colonies which would cost huge sums of money, they would raise a feeling in the country against them, whereas they could carry the opinion of the country with them by putting their finance on sound lines which, while meeting the requirements of the country as a whole, would enable them to carry out great schemes of social reform. He had only one further word to say as one who endorsed the principles — he did not say every word he wrote—of Henry George in respect of land; and it was, that that great uncreated monopoly had never yet yielded to the community what it ought to have done.

*MR. RAWLINSON (Cambridge University) said he had ventured last year to call attention to the most overtaxed members of the community, namely, professional men such as clergymen, doctors, and lawyers, with, say, an income of only £300 a year and upwards, and he said that these men were bearing an undue proportion of taxation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had met the claims of these men to a considerable extent, and for that concession he was grateful, because the right hon. Gentleman proposed (rather illogically he thought as to the limit selected) to reduce the income-tax on earned incomes below £2,000 from 1s. to 9d. For that, as he had said, he was grateful, but if it was not ungrateful to look a gift horse in the mouth he might venture to criticise the limitation of the concession; he certainly must say it was not logical, but probably it would be ungracious to make a comment upon that, because those whom he wished to assist did not possess incomes which rose to £2,000 a year. There were two small points which he mentioned last year, referring to people with whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not dealt. Assuming that a man was earning from £500 to £700 a year, if he were a bachelor he paid on that sum subject to the deduction allowed in such cases, but a married couple for some extraordinary reason were treated as one person and he thought they ought to be treated as two people. If the wife had £200 a year and the husband £600 a year, making a total of £800, they both ought not to lose the exemption, but such was the case at the present time. The other matter was the case of a man who was trading in the Colonies but living in England. If he traded in South Africa, he had to pay income tax there and also in England, therefore paying it twice. It seemed somewhat hard that those Colonials who lived in the Mother Country and those Englishmen who traded in the Colonies should be penalised in this manner. Passing from these smaller points of criticism, he protested against one important proposal which was a great departure both from the principles of sound finance and from the policy of the right hon. Gentleman's predecessors. He alluded to the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with the 1s. income-tax as a permanent integral part of national finance and taxation. The right hon. Gentleman had intimated that the income-tax of 1s. on all incomes over £2,000 a year should remain as a permanent tax. That was not only a departure from the policy of his predecessors, but, in his judgment, it was unsound finance. To keep such a tax would be disastrous, as undoubtedly it was a heavy clog on commercial enterprise and business in this country. There were countries which had not got an income-tax, and to have an income-tax at that high rate in this country would undoubtedly act as a clog on our industries and might tempt manufacturers to move their businesses to other countries. Such a policy would, moreover, allow of no elasticity in case of war or other emergency. He would like to know what Mr. Gladstone would have said to a permanent income-tax, because they were all familiar with the remarks he made even on an income-tax at 6d.; but with a permanent income-tax of 1s. it was difficult to see where in case of war the reserve of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be, and where he would get his money from. One other point he wanted to criticise had regard to the capacity of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to the stability of his views. The right hon. Gentleman had said to-day that he did not propose a reduction of the tax on tea because he was satisfied that to reduce it by a 1d. a pound would not make any difference to the consumer. He did not propose for the moment to discuss the accuracy or inaccuracy of that view. Last year when the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget reduced the tea duty by a 1d. he was challenged from both sides of the House on that very point, and on the 29th of May last, sometime after the introduction of the Budget, he made a speech to the effect that he had made most careful inquiries and the net result was diametrically opposed to what he had told them to-day to be his undoubted opinion. The right hon. Gentleman said according to Hansard—

> "That the question which he asked his advisers at the Treasury, and which he anxiously considered before making this proposal was whether a reduction of 1d., which was without precedent, would really reach the consumer. No Chancellor of the Exchequer would wish to put money into the pockets of the trade; what he desired was to secure that the benefit of the remission should go to the person by whom the article was consumed. He made inquiries whether or not the effect of the remission of 1d. would reach the consumer, and he was assured by all the information he could gather that in an article like tea, where a duty of 6d. represented something like 100 per cent. on the actual value of the imported raw material, a reduction of 1d., or 15 per cent., where there were no intermediate processes of manipulation, in the course of which the reduction might be either delayed, intercepted, or neutralised, must speedily reach the consumer.

What had happened? The hon. Member had quoted from information that had been given to him that the reduction had gone into the pockets of the blenders. He would like to read a few words from The Times Commercial Supplement, which all must agree was a most admirable and very impartial summary of what went on in the commercial world. On 21st May, under the heading of 'Tea,' The Times Commercial Supplement dealt with this matter."

Then followed a quotation of half a column of matter proving that the penny had gone into the pocket of the consumer, which he need not read, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer added—

> "According to this authority, which was not prejudiced in favour of the Government, the effect of the reduction had already been felt and the consumer was receiving it in a reduced price of 2d., or he was paying 10d. now for what he formerly paid 1s."

If last year the 1d. reduction had really saved the consumer 2d., he would like to know from the right hon. Gentleman why this year it should be regarded as axiomatic that the reduction of a further 1d. would not reach the consumer at all. There was one point upon which he wished to give his most unfeigned support to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was afraid he was one of those who had taken the view that the national credit had been in jeopardy during the last year not only in consequence of extravagance in the way of money, but also in the way of speech. It was therefore with unfeigned gratification that he recognised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had set aside a considerable sum for the reduction of the National Debt, and he believed he only expressed the views of most business men when he said that this money so spent would tend to reinstate the financial credit and security of the country, and probably would be repaid in the way of increased investments being made in this country.

*MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester) said the Labour Party sympathised with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his attempt to reconstruct the machinery of taxation, and on the whole they welcomed the announcement that he intended to readjust the relations between central and local finance. But the great fault of his speech was the very sparse reference to all practical proposals dealing with social reform. The Labour Party were profoundly disappointed with his attitude to the old-age pension question. They saw no reason why the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not find a sufficient sum of money to start the scheme this year. It was profoundly unsatisfactory that year after year these sympathetic speeches should be made. They were perfectly prepared to admit that the Chancellor of the Echequer had gone further than any other statesman who had spoken on the question, but the gulf still fixed between promise and performance was too large not to be disquieting. They were told the scheme would start next year, but they did not know what the state of the finances would be in a year's time. The Labour Party had no objection to the reduction of the income-tax, but in the minds of some of the Members of that Party it appeared as though the Chancellor of the Exchequer had felt that he could not reduce the income-tax and give old-age pensions at the same time. The right hon. Gentleman did not put it in that way, but some of the Labour Members felt that he had passed through that mental process. There was nobody more sympathetic than he with the oppressed shopkeeper with a small and precarious income, or with the oppressed professional man, whose income, though not exactly small, was precarious and whose cost of living had perforce to be high. But while sympathetic with these people and fully recognising their claims, yet if those claims were to defer an old-age pensions scheme, then they were not in favour of the reduction of income-tax, but they were in favour of old-age pensions. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had reduced the income-tax because he felt that he could not give them old-age pensions, then they regretted exceedingly that he had not selected an old-age pension scheme rather than the reduction of the income-tax. Moreover, on the merits of the reduction they were not quite satisfied. They thought £2,000 was far too large a limit, and they rather regarded the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman as one to relieve middle class taxation. The middle classes were the beneficiaries under his Budget scheme. They submitted that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted an income for old-age pensions or social reforms, it would have been perfectly sufficient for him to have fixed the differentiation, not at £2,000, but at £1,200 or £1,500 at the very outside. So far as the readjustment of taxation was concerned, they were on the whole in agreement with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They stood as he did for free trade. They believed that under free trade the system of taxation was much more equitable than taxation under a system of protection. Under free trade they taxed the people who could bear the tax; under protection they taxed the people who could not bear the tax. Under free trade taxation was upon a scientific basis, which consisted in this, that they had got to put their finger upon earned income and tax that lightly. The great problem which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to face, which he had partially solved, though not completely, was this problem of differentiating between income that came from social sources and income that came from individualistic sources. In this respect, they regretted that he had not gone further than he had done. As a matter of fact, unearned incomes which flowed from social sources ought never to find their way into private pockets at all. The community were the authors of these values, which went to make personal incomes and which ought to be the subject of a series of carefully constructed taxes so that the State could get for itself the whole of those unearned incomes. A shilling upon unearned incomes over £2,000 was too little. He suggested to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should increase it to 1s. 6d. as a beginning. In that way he would earn still more the gratitude of the democratically-minded sections of the community. Another point on which they felt was this: if the weight of the taxes of a direct character was to be lightened, then it ought to have been done at the same time as indirect taxes were lightened. If the choice was to be between direct and indirect taxation for the purpose of lightening it, then he thought that the choice ought to have been in favour of indirect taxation. It was not a question of 4d. instead of 5d. on tea. That would not be an appreciable boon to the working classes. But take sugar. This was used at the breakfast table, and unless they took the whole of the duty off it would have no appreciable effect on prices for working class consumers. But sugar was a raw material, and if they took the tax off sugar to the extent of one-third, it would have an appreciable effect in stimulating industries which depended on sugar as a raw material. So that it was not merely a question of the working classes, but it was also a question of healthy production; and it would have been much sounder, from the point of view of economics, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told the income tax-payers that he could not relieve them this year; that he had got the funds for old-age pensions, such social reforms as the medical inspection of school children, and was going to use them at once. The right hon. Gentleman might have also said, "As a matter of fact, I have got to find a larger income, and I propose to put a heavier tax on large incomes; I cannot relieve the taxpayer this year, but in order to stimulate the industry of this country I am going to take one-third or one-half off the taxation on sugar." If the right hon. Gentleman had constructed his Budget on those lines it would have been more acceptable to the democratic and Liberal opinion which gave him such a magnificent majority at the last election. When the Finance Bill was before the House the Labour Party would have to produce an Amendment which would raise the whole question of old-age pensions.

*MR. MORTON (Sutherland) said he felt thankful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer not only for the clear way in which he had brought forward his Budget, but also for his determination that Debt should be paid off, especially when there were still £139,000,000 of the war debt remaining. He could quite understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in bringing in his Budget could not hope to please everybody, but he hoped that when they had got rid of the war debt there would be a serious attempt to reduce taxation. He trusted that they would see every economy practised in the spending of public money. Though the working classes did not directly get anything out of this Budget, yet they did get some benefit from the public money which was spent on education. He did not think that they ought to have the sugar tax at all, because it made living more expensive, especially for the industrial classes, while it adversely affected certain industries of the country. It was a double mischief, and the sooner the Government could see their way to get rid of it altogether the better it would be. Of course, he saw the difficulty of reducing the taxes, and was aware that after it was frequently a long time before the consumer got the full benefit of a reduction. The Chancellor of the Exchequer last year mentioned in his speech that in connection with new telegraph lines two-thirds of the annual cost would be guaranteed by the Government. There were exceptional distances in Sutherlandshire, but there had been a refusal to take any share of the guarantee. He would like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he had not carried out the promise he made last year. If there was a case entitled to the full benefit of the Chancellor's promise it was that of Sutherland. As to the income-tax, he agreed with his hon. friend that it would have been much better if the margin had been fixed at £1,200 or £1,500 instead of £2,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might have a further opportunity of considering that matter and of doing what he could to make the rich pay their due share of the taxation of the country. As representing the country, it was their duty to make those pay who were best able to bear the burden. The taxation of the country was at the present time very excessive, and the Budget of to-day provided for an expenditure of nearly £40,000,000 more than was required ten years ago. Heavy taxation interfered seriously with trade. Some members of the Labour Party said that heavy taxation did not matter so much, because the rich would have to pay it, but he did not agree with that argument. Taxes had to be paid out of profits, which were largely made by the exertions of the working classes. If an employer had to pay such a large portion of his profits away in taxation he had no margin left to increase the wages of those who worked for him. Taxation, therefore, did affect all classes of the community.

MR. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor) called attention to the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and complained that no reply had been made to the speech of the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury) stated that it had been agreed across the Table that the formal Resolutions should be taken to-night, and the principal debate on Monday. Under the agreement between the two sides, two or three Resolutions involving contentious matter would be held back.

MR. EVELYN CECIL said he was not aware of that arrangement, but in view of what the hon. Gentleman had said he would defer any further remarks until Monday.

MR. MORTON protested against arrangements of this kind being made across the Table. He did not see why the debate should not be continued. He did not object to the Chancellor of the Exchequer taking a rest, but he had left behind a very able Gentleman who could reply for the Government. He regretted the bargain which had been made between the two front benches, because such arrangements always placed them between the devil and the deep blue sea.

Question put, and agreed to.

CONTINUANCE OF ADDITIONAL CUSTOMS DUTIES ON TOBACCO, BEER, AND SPIRITS.

2. Resolved, That the additional Customs duties on tobacco, beer, and spirits imposed by sections two, three, four, and five of The Finance Act, 1900 (including any increased duties imposed by section five of that Act), shall continue to be charged until Parliament otherwise determine.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

CONTINUANCE OF ADDITIONAL EXCISE DUTIES ON BEER AND SPIRITS.

3. Resolved, That the additional Excise duties on beer and spirits imposed by sections six and seven of The Finance Act, 1900, shall continue to be charged until Parliament otherwise determine.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

HIRE PURCHASE AGREEMENT.

4. Resolved, That a hire purchase agreement shall be charged with stamp duty as an agreement, or if under seal or in Scotland with a clause of registration as a deed, as the case requires, and shall not in any case be exempt from stamp duty as an agreement, letter, or memorandum made for or relating to the sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

ESTATE DUTY (FINANCE ACT, 1896, s. 21).

5. Resolved, That the deduction allowed under section twenty-one of The Finance Act, 1896, on account of the previous payment of duty on property shall (instead of being calculated as provided by that section) be taken to be the amount which would be payable on account of the duty on the property if the duty were calculated on the value of the property upon which estate duty is payable.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

PERMANENT ANNUAL CHARGE.

6. Resolved, That the permanent annual charge for the National Debt for the current financial year be twenty-nine and a-half million pounds.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

AMENDMENT OF LAW.

7. Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the law relating to the National Debt, Customs, and Inland Revenue.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn,"—(Mr. Whiteley)—put, and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Five minutes before Ten o'clock.

POLICE ACT, 1890.

NATIONAL PHYSICAL LABORATORY.

Preparation of Parliamentary Returns by Customs Statistical Office.

Major COATES (Lewisham): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury what class of clerks prepare and check the Parliamentary Returns required from the Statistical Office of the Customs.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) I learn that Parliamentary Returns required from the Statistical Office are prepared by assistant clerks, allowanced assistant clerks, and by the staff generally, and as far as necessary are checked by allowanced assistant clerks, minor staff officers, junior clerks, and senior clerks. Such Returns are also finally scrutinised by senior clerks before being submitted to the deputy principal and principal.

Salaries of Staff of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries.

VISCOUNT HELMSLEY (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury why it is that the salaries paid to the staff of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries are on a lower scale than those paid in other departments of the State similarly constituted, e.g., the Local Government Board and the Board of Trade, and whether his attention has been called to the fact that since the creation of the Department in 1889 many fresh duties have been imposed upon it.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The staff and salaries of different departments are settled on the basis of the requirements of each department. I do not consider it possible to compare the work of departments differing so widely in functions as those named. All departments are of course liable to have their duties added to by legislation.

Valuation of Newport (Mon.) Public Houses—Decision of Inland Revenue.

MR. L. HASLAM (Monmouth Boroughs): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that on the 4th day of August, 1906, valuations of four licensed public houses in the borough of Newport (Mon.) were remitted to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for determination, and that up to the present time no decision has been obtained from the Commissioners, thus causing delay there in carrying out the provisions of The Licensing Act, 1904, and increasing the difficulty experienced by the justices in estimating the amount available for compensation purposes; and whether he will take such steps as may be necessary to expedite the decision of the Commissioners in this and like cases.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The computation of compensation under the Licensing Act, 1904, in accordance with the principles laid down by the court, requires the collection of a great deal of detailed information, and this has made it impossible for the Board of Inland Revenue to proceed otherwise than slowly with the large number of cases referred to them in the year 1906. The cases referred from the borough of Newport (Mon.) have, however, now been dealt with, and the determinations of the Commissioners have been communicated to the compensation authority.

Alleged Dissatisfaction amongst Irish National School Inspectors.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the dissatisfaction amongst inspectors of national schools in Ireland, because they are constantly harassed by letters from the Education Office, to which many of them had to write strongly in reply, while others had to travel long distances from the country to Dublin to remonstrate in person against such treatment, and some are afraid to give expression to their feelings on the matter for fear of penalties involved; whether these letters are the productions of clerks and others utterly ignorant of inspection work; whether any of the twenty Commissioners, except Dr. Starkie, can be sufficiently intimate with the working of the Education Office to know anything about the justice of any fine or censure imposed; and whether, seeing complaints or protests only lead to further punishment which, owing to the ignorance of the inner working of the office on the part of nearly all the Commissioners, can be inflicted with impunity, he will appoint a small committee to inquire into the working of the National Education Office.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that they are not aware that dissatisfaction exists amongst their inspectors generally. Certain inspectors have been guilty of irregularities and have performed their duties in an unsatisfactory manner, and have consequently incurred official censure. This censure was not imposed until the cases had been very fully investigated by the chief or senior inspectors and the facts placed before the resident Commissioner or the Board. Two of the inspectors concerned were summoned before a special committee meeting of the Commissioners, and were afforded full opportunity of answering the charges brought against them. The Commissioners individually are kept fully informed of all the business of the office, and no serious punishment is inflicted on any officers without their authority. The maintenance of discipline among the staff is a matter which falls within the province of the Commissioners themselves, and facts have been brought to my notice which would appear to call for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the matter.

Jamaica Banana Trade Subsidy.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the subsidy of £40,000 per annum paid by Great Britain and Jamaica, by securing to the banana growers the advantage of competition of British markets, has absolutely failed, through the subsidised company combining with the United Fruit Company of America; and whether, seeing that, instead of developing Jamaica bananas, they have increased the importation of the Costa Rica bananas, planted and grown specially since the subsidy was granted, he can state what action, if any, he proposes to take in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The Secretary of State is not prepared to admit that the subsidy referred to has failed in its main object of assisting the development of the Jamaica banana trade. It is not proposed to take any action in the matter.

Herrings in the Clyde Districts.

MR. LAMONT (Buteshire): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he will lay upon the Table a statement showing the number of hundredweights of herrings landed in the Clyde districts collectively, and in Campbeltown, Inverary, Rothesay, Greenock, and Ballantrae severally, during the year 1906, in continuation of the statement furnished by him on March 15th, 1906.

(Answered by Mr Sinclair.) The information desired by my hon. friend is as follows:—

	Cwts.
District of Campbeltown	38,745
District of Inverary	18,403
District of Rothesay	47,982
District of Greenock	27,511
District of Ballantrae	54,947

Workhouse Dietary—Saving of Bread.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the Report of the workhouse master to the Dover Board of Guardians, dated the 12th instant, to the effect that he had saved thirteen tons of bread, value £133, on the dietary scale, and that this had been achieved by the adoption of the principle of allowing inmates to have what bread they required, instead of serving out the regulation quantity, which had hitherto resulted in waste; and whether, in view of the saving thus gained, at no loss to the inmates of the workhouse, he will direct the attention of all local authorities to the matter.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The Dietaries Order issued by the Local Government Board in October, 1900, contains a regulation enabling the guardians of every Poor Law union to direct, in respect of any class of inmates of the workhouse, that a definite portion of the prescribed allowance of bread shall be served in the first instance to each inmate. Any inmate, however, may demand the full allowance to which he is entitled, and the total allowance for each class must in all cases be sent into the dining-room. I understand that the course adopted at Dover is in accordance with this regulation. The matter was brought under the notice of all boards of guardians in the circular which accompanied the Order, and I believe that much advantage has resulted; but I will instruct the inspectors to draw the attention of the guardians to the regulation in any cases where this may be necessary.

Discoveries of Hidden Cartridges.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the recent discoveries of hidden cartridges have already, this month, amounted to 184,000, as follows: In Newcastle on 9th April, 31,000, Newcastle on 10th April, 100,000, Sunderland on 3rd April, 35,000, Glasgow on 12th April, 15,000, and Edinburgh on 15th April 3,000; and, if so, whether he can throw any further light on the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The number of cartridges seized at Newcastle on the 10th instant was 85,000; otherwise I believe the figures given by the hon. Member are substantially correct. I received reports from the Chief Constables of Newcastle and Sutherland, stating that in both places the matter was under investigation in the police courts. Since then I have learnt that the defendant at Sunderland has been convicted and fined £20 for unlawful storage of explosives, and that the magistrates have directed the forfeiture of the explosives. The question of prosecutions at Glasgow and Edinburgh is, I am informed, receiving the attention of the Lord Advocate.

Irish Tax Revenue.

MR. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.); To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state what was the amount of the tax revenue contributed by Ireland in the financial year 1801–2.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) £2,521,219.

Account of Mr. Clementi's Tour.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether any record exists in the India Office, or is available elsewhere, of a journey recently made by Mr. Clementi, of the Hong Kong Civil Service, across South China and Yunnan to Burma; and, if so, whether he will place such record in the Library.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) As Mr. Clementi is an officer in the Colonial Service I will reply to this Question. It is understood that Mr. Clementi is preparing an account of his recent tour, but it is impossible to say whether or not it will be published.

Sale of the Whyte Estate, County Leitrim.

MR. DOLAN (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners are proceeding with the arrangements for the sale of the Whyte estate, Newtownmanor, county Leitrim; and, if so, what steps are being taken, an order for sale under Section 40 of The Land Act, 1903, having been made some months ago.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Land Judge has made an order for the sale of this estate, and the Estates Commissioners have lodged a request, under Section 7 of the Act of 1903, for particulars of the estate with a view to considering the question of purchase. I am informed that the title of the estate is very long and complicated, and as a result the Land Judge's Court will not be in a position to comply with the Estates Commissioners' request for several months to come.

Irish Evicted Tenants—Case of Patrick Woods.

MR. THOMAS F. SMYTH (Leitrim, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement from Patrick Woods, Anskert, Annaghmore, on the Allen estate, in county Leitrim; and, if so, will an inspector investigate the same.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have recently received the application referred to, and will have the case investigated by an inspector in due course.

Irish Emigration Returns.

MR. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what proportion of the emigrants from Ireland since 1841 came from each of the four provinces, and what proportion the total in each province bears to the average population in that province during the period.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) During the period from 1st May, 1851, to 31st December, 1906, the proportion of emigrants from Ireland according to provinces was : Leinster, 17·4 per cent. ; Munster, 35·1 per cent. ; Ulster, 28·2 per cent. ; Connaught, 16·6 per cent. ; province not specified, 2·7 per cent. In the same period the ratio of emigrants to every 100 of the average population was : Leinster, 52·5 ; Munster, 102·4 ; Ulster, 64·1 ; Connaught, 81·6. Emigration Returns were not prepared prior to 1851.

Irish Agricultural Department Grants.

MR. J. MACVEAGH : To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the £1,198,502 stated to be voted by Parliament to the Department of Agriculture during the past seven years includes the endowment fund, and what the amount of the endowment was.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The sum of £1,198,502 referred to in the Question includes, in addition to £185,000 paid over to the Congested Districts Board, a sum of £126,000 (that is, £18,000 a year for the past seven years), which was provided by Parliament under Section 15, Sub-sections (d) and (f), of the Agriculture and Technical Instruction Act of 1899. The last-mentioned sum, though provided in the Parliamentary Vote, forms portion of the endowment fund established under that section of the Act. The amount received into the endowment fund in the past seven years, excluding the sum provided in the Vote, was as follows :—

Annual statutory receipts under Section 15, Sub-sections (a) and (b) - - - -	1,036,000
Received under the Agriculture and Technical Instruction Act, 1902 - - -	25,000
Received from the Ireland Development Grant for Technical Instruction - -	17,500
Received from the Congested Districts Board - -	6,000

Teaching of Roman Catholic Children in Irish Protestant Schools.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.) : To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether His Majesty's Government will take immediate steps to alter the position created under the rules of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland by which teachers of the Roman Catholic faith may be appointed to teach Roman Catholic children in a minority in a school the majority of children attending which are Protestants, whilst Protestant teachers are not permitted to be appointed to teach Protestant children in a minority in a school the majority of children attending which are Roman Catholics.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that the rule referred to will have the effect mentioned in the Question. I have already explained that the object of the rule was to remove obstacles to the combined education of Protestants of different denominations, and I have stated on the authority of the Commissioners that the rule is not to be applied in schools under Protestant management in which there is a minority of Roman Catholic pupils.

Lough Cutra National Schools—Religious Instruction.

MR. SLOAN : To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Protestant children attending Lough Cutra national school, county Galway, are compelled to be present at the opening of the school to answer the roll call, after which they are turned out in all kinds of weather until religious instruction is given to Roman Catholic scholars ; and whether seeing that the parents of these Protestant children have asked leave to send their children to this school after religious instruction has been given, he will make inquiries into the matter, with a view to granting their request.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Lough Cutra boys' and girls' national schools are on the estate of Viscount Gough, who is patron, the manager being Mr. F. F. Persse. The Commissioners of National Education have no information that the fact is as stated in the Question. There are five Protestant pupils on the rolls of the boys' school, and four Protestant pupils on the rolls of the girls' school, and there is no reason why any of these pupils should be present before 10.20 each morning, when the religious instruction has finished.

Typhus Outbreak at Oughterard.

MR. O'MALLEY (Galway, Connemara): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the resolution of the Oughterard Rural District Council, passed on the 11th inst., in which it is stated that the outbreak of typhus in the district was due to famine conditions rather than to the insanitary condition of the houses where the outbreak originated, as reported by the Local Government Board medical inspector; and whether he will institute adequate relief works to cope with the distress that prevails in the Oughterard union.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) According to the resolution referred to, the district council appear to consider that the fever is not due to the insanitary conditions described by the Local Government Board's inspectors, inasmuch as the same conditions have always prevailed in Oughterard. The Board, however, are satisfied that the contention of the council has no support. The state of things found by the inspector constitutes a perpetual menace to public health, and if district councils were to be absolved from all responsibility in cases in which insanitary conditions have existed for a long time there would be an end of sanitary reform in Ireland. The Local Government Board are entirely satisfied that there is no foundation for the suggestion that famine prevails in this union and has caused the outbreak of fever. The guardians are bound by law to keep their relieving officers in funds for the relief of all urgent cases. They are well aware of their statutory obligations and powers, and the Board cannot consider that they would be so oblivious of their duty to the destitute poor as to allow them to suffer from want of food to an extent which would cause famine fever. The Local Government Board have afforded through the spring months, and are still affording, employment to many hundreds of families in the poorest parts of this union where distress was apprehended, and the rates have thereby been relieved of a considerable burden. The Board are satisfied that the resources of the union will be ample to enable the guardians to provide any further relief that may be necessary.

The Hague Conference and Aerial Navigation.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the expiration of the five years' term for which the launching of explosives from air ships was by agreement of the Powers prohibited, and the possible absence of present unanimity and difficulty of enforcement of any new agreement, he can give the House general information as to any decision of the Defence Committee upon the subject; whether defensive airship experiment and construction is treated as the exclusive concern of the Army, or how far the Admiralty is being consulted with regard to it.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) As the question of the renewal of this agreement will doubtless be considered at the coming Conference at the Hague, I think it better to say nothing on the subject of renewal at the present moment. The Naval and Military Departments are watching such progress as has been made with aerial navigation, but experimental work, so far, has been confined to the War Office.

MEN EMPLOYED IN GOVERNMENT ORDNANCE FACTORIES AND AT WOOLWICH ARSENAL.

In the printed Answer to the Questions by Mr. Barnes and Mr. Rowlands of Wednesday last (appearing on page 970) the figures given for 1895–6 for Royal Small Arms Factory, Birmingham, should be 568 (instead of 883), and for Royal Gunpowder Factory, Waltham, 883 (instead of 568).

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Sir Walter Richard Nugent, baronet, for the county of Westmeath, South Westmeath Division.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir WILLIAM BRAMPTON GURDON reported from the Committee of Selection; That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures: Mr. Cochrane; and had appointed in substitution: Mr. Akers-Douglas.

Report to lie upon the Table.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, N.), in moving that this Bill be read a second time, said he only desired as an Irish farmer who knew something about land to say it was no use to pass a Land Purchase Bill unless compulsion was put into it, because the landlords and agents in Ireland would always study how to get round it. He begged to move.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.), in seconding the Motion, said the object of the measure had been very briefly indicated by his hon. friend, and perhaps it would be regarded as desirable that, at the beginning of the debate, a somewhat more detailed explanation should be given on behalf of those who were responsible for its provisions. He believed that the Bill was the natural and inevitable consequence of existing legislation and of the experience of the last few years. Let them take the question of land purchase with which the Bill was for the most part concerned. Whatever anyone might think or might have thought of the policy of land purchase, it was several years now since most people came to the conclusion that in that direction alone, so far as Ireland was concerned, might be found the solution of one of the most difficult and thorny problems which had ever engaged the attention of any Legislature in modern times. For one reason alone it was now useless to think of any other solution whatever. Too many occupiers of land in Ireland had already become the owners of their own holdings for anyone to think it possible that the process of purchase should cease till the whole body of ordinary occupiers had been turned into proprietors. But at least two vital facts had been brought into special prominence since the passing of the Irish Land Act of 1903, which showed that, without further legislation, the end which practically all persons now admitted to be inevitable could not in some cases be attained at all, and, in other cases, could be attained only at a risk which Ireland could not afford to run. One of those facts was that the price of land sold under the Land Purchase Acts had gone up in a very extraordinary way without any corresponding increase in the value of the land having taken place. He should not weary the House by going into statistics. It was enough to say what was universally admitted—that the price had gone up since 1903 by at least five or six years purchase of the rent, while at the very same time the price of agricultural commodities had either gone down or remained stationary. No one could deny that that was a very serious matter for Ireland, and he said for Ireland advisedly, because it was Ireland which would suffer if the price turned out to be one which could not be paid by the Irish tenant purchasers. Even within the last few days Answers to certain Questions which had been put to the Secretary for Ireland had brought this fact unpleasantly home to Irish Members and their constituents. They had got in this matter the aid of Imperial credit—no small thing, but the late Government and its Unionist predecessor in 1891 took right good care to surround the lending authority with a triple safeguard against loss. Before the Imperial Treasury could lose a penny by land purchase in Ireland, the land bought, the Imperial grants to Ireland, and the local rates in Ireland, those paid by persons who were not farmers as well as those paid by people who were, must first be exhausted. It was, therefore, a very serious matter for all classes of people in Ireland that the prices paid for Irish land should have risen as they had done, without any known cause beyond that furnished by the conditions on which the purchase money, as the law now stood, was advanced. He confessed he was himself one of those who did not see much or any harm in the establishment of zones within which money must be advanced without the delay caused by inspection. He thought that it would hasten sales, and that it would not lead to the enhancement of prices. But he had come to the conclusion, like most others, that the mere pointing at prices which might be asked and paid, and the dispensing with any inquiry as to whether proper security was taken for the money advanced, had directly and unmistakably tended to inflate artificially the price of the landlords' property, and, accordingly, the first proposal they made in this Bill was to abolish the zones and to revert to the practice, in the case of sales by agreement, of requiring the Land Commission not to advance any money unless they were satisfied that the agreed price was equitable to tenants as well as to owners, and that the repayment of it was amply secured. That was the first proposal in this Bill, and it was one in which Ireland as a whole was interested, though he imagined that the Treasury might well conclude that it was one in which they were interested also. Ireland, as a whole, would have to pay, and Ireland, therefore, must take care, as far as it could, that it did not run too great a risk. The other vital fact to which he had referred as having been brought into special prominence in recent years was that many landlords would not sell at all, no matter what inducements they might receive. This, again, was a very serious matter from more points of view than one. From the point of view of social order it was extremely dangerous to have on one side of the hedge or wall a body of tenant occupiers still groaning under excessive rents, assessed partly on their own improvements, and still in some fear of agents and bailiffs; while on the other side was to be found a contented, if not a very thriving, body of occupying owners. The co-existence of two such bodies would necessarily produce intolerable results. Moreover, one of the duties cast upon the Estates Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1903 was to redistribute the grazing ranches, from which the people were evicted wholesale in the time of the dreadful clearances of the last century, amongst the thousands of tenants now eking out in some mysterious way a miserable existence on patches of land too diminutive to afford them a decent subsistence. But this duty, which was not only cast on the Estates Commissioners, but was one of the principal duties of the Congested Districts Board, could never be performed effectively by either body under the law as it stood, or as long as certain owners of land refused to facilitate its performance; and yet it was absolutely safe to say that till the land to which he referred was opened up to the landless people the Irish land question would remain unsolved. It was really very amusing to hear the right hon. Member for Dover, when dealing with the Land Bill of 1903, repeatedly make statements to the effect that there was "not land enough to go round" amongst the various classes of the agricultural population of Ireland who were without any land, or possessed only too small a portion and asked for some land or for a larger portion than they had. Certainly there would not be enough for all the claimants if a comparatively few graziers, many of whom were not even tenants at will, were allowed to monopolise thousands of acres apiece. But there would be land enough and to spare for those who had none or too little, if those big grazing ranches were made available for division, and it was absolute nonsense to say the reverse. But there was another consideration which must be taken into account. It was surely time to put an end to the reign of the Clanricardes of the country. There were more of them than one. He need not describe them. They were a standing menace to social order; their action as landlords was a perpetual invitation to social strife; from various motives into which he would not enter, they would neither act with consideration or even justice towards their tenants, nor take a fair price for their interest in their estates and go away with the money. Was it expedient that they should be allowed to remain as landlords? It was quite evident that the answer to that question must be in the negative. For these reasons they had come to the conclusion that compulsory sale and compulsory purchase must at last be resorted to; and, accordingly, they proposed to give the Estates Commissioners power, where no agreement could be arrived at, and where either the landlord or three-fourths of the tenants put them in motion, to compel the landlord to sell either to themselves or to the tenants, and to compel the tenants to buy at a price to be fixed by the Commissioners, after having heard the views of all the parties interested, including the tenants, and after having made it certain that the sum advanced was properly secured.

That was as regarded the sale of tenanted estates. As to the sale and purchase of parcels of land for re-distribution amongst the landless people, they proposed to empower the Estates Commissioners, if they could not acquire much land by agreement, to acquire it by compulsion. But the sort of land in regard to which they proposed to give this power was strictly defined, because they did not want to bear hardly on any large tenant of land who was doing useful service not only to himself, but to the community, by, for instance. the employment of labour. They did not aim at any large farm on which a rent could be fixed, which, though it was one on which the tenant did not reside, was worked by him in conjunction with the holding on which he did reside. They aimed chiefly at those large grazing ranches, a great proportion of which were not tenanted land at all in the technical sense of the term, because they were let out for only eleven months of the year, and the rest of which, though tenanted, were held on an uncertain tenure, and were, therefore, holdings in which the tenants of them had no real interest, and had, as a rule, enough of land without them. They proposed that all such lands as were necessary for the purpose of relieving congestion, for enlarging uneconomic holdings, and for providing land for people who were now without any, should be purchased, by agreement if possible, by compulsion if agreement was unattainable. In regard to purchases of this kind also, they proposed that the Estates Commissoners should have due regard to the owners, and other persons interested in the land, and to the security for the money advanced. Those same powers, he must add, they proposed to give to the Congested Districts Board, by whom, he believed, they were desired, and who at present were hampered on all sides in the performance of the most important work now going on in Ireland, by the want of such powers. He did not think that they were called upon at this time of day to defend the principle of compulsion as applied to land. Since the year 1845 that principle had been embedded in their legislation. Every session power was given to local authorities to acquire compulsorily land at a price fixed by an authority independent of owners and purchasers. In Irish land legislation it had been resorted to again and again. Before the Act of 1893, if there were, say, an owner in fee, a leaseholder with a term of 1,000 years, another leaseholder of 200 years, and another with a sixty years term at the time of sale, the lowest down in the scale of owners was the selling owner, as he was still, for the purpose of sale under the Land Purchase Acts, and, once he made an agreement with the occupying tenants, every owner above him was compulsorily bought out at a price fixed by the constituted tribunal. The Act of 1893 went a step further and provided that, if there were owners between the sixty-year man and the occupying tenants, they also were to be compulsorily redeemed in the same way. The question in all cases was whether there was a public necessity for the application of the compulsory principle, and what they said on that subject was that such a necessity had never existed if it did not exist in the cases now under consideration. When there were thousands and tens of thousands of people without any land at all; when tens of thousands of others were living on patches of land wholly insufficient for their support in decent comfort; when, in consequence of those two facts, there was still a deadly drain of emigration of the very flower of the population, the time in their opinion was past for peddling measures, or for academic discussions on the abstract merits or demerits of the principle of compulsion, or for waiting, like Micawber, for "something to turn up." Ireland could not afford to wait; that was the short and the long of it. At present, a railway company would be empowered to purchase by compulsion the choicest spots of land in England, if it proved that it was for the public advantage that a railway should run through it. Was it of any importance to save a whole people? He would not argue the matter of compulsion further, especially in a House of Commons which was predominantly Liberal, and for the reason that the Liberal Party was pledged to the application of the compulsory principle to Irish land. In 1901 and 1902 the question was specifically raised, and on both those occasions the Leaders of the Liberal Party as well as their followers, speaking of them as a body, voted in favour of compulsion. Amongst them he might mention the present Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary of State for War, the Home Secretary, and several others in the front rank of the Party. He could not suppose that they would now recede from the position they adopted five and six years ago. This Bill contained several other proposals dealing with land purchase, but he should notice only two or three of the more important. A good deal had been heard in recent years of the grievances of town tenants in Ireland. Something was done last year to remove those grievances. Clause 13 of this Bill was intended to supplement the Town Tenants Act in a way which would be at once effective and, he believed, entirely unobjectionable to the landlords. The Act of 1903 enabled owners in fee of an estate which was mainly agricultural to sell all non-agricultural holdings on the estate, such as houses in villages and towns, provided they were not the main part of the estate. But the Act also provided that where those non-agricultural holdings were held by middlemen under long leases the provision regarding the compulsory redemption of interests intervening between the owner in fee and the occupying tenants should not operate. It was, in his opinion, an objectless and stupid Amendment, and it had tended to prevent the sale of many small villages and towns, particularly in the West of Ireland. They sought to repeal it, and thus to allow the town tenants in those places to become their own landlords, and thus solve for ever, so far at least as they were concerned, the town tenants question. The matter of sporting rights had been the cause of much friction, bad feeling, and obstruction to the sale of estates. Landlords in many cases had insisted, when selling, on retaining those rights, while the tenants generally had objected to their doing so, on the very intelligible ground that if they did not possess those rights they would constantly be subjected to all sorts of interference in the management of their holdings. There was a very general feeling that sporting rights might be made in many parts of the country a valuable asset, but they could only be made so with the consent and goodwill of the new proprietors, and they therefore proposed that they must henceforth go with the fee simple, unless the new proprietor voluntarily gave them to the old proprietor for his life. They similarly proposed that all gravel, sand, stone and clay should go with the land purchased, except where a quarry was being actually worked by the landlord at the time of the sale, and they did so for a similar reason, namely, that as long as a landlord was allowed to retain such things, which might be absolutely necessary for the proper cultivation and management of a holding, sales would be as they had been, obstructed. The only other proposal regarding land purchase to which he would refer was that regarding the bonus. The Act of 1903 itself contained a provision under which the arrangements then made regarding the bonus might be revised towards the close of next year. It seemed to him that the time had already come for a different arrangement. The original idea in giving a bonus at all was to facilitate sales by bridging the gap between the figure at which the landlord could afford to sell and that at which the tenant could afford to buy. But the provision whereby the bonus given to the landlord rose in proportion to the price he exacted for his land had naturally had the effect of forcing prices up and thus depriving the tenants of the pecuniary advantage which was intended for them by Parliament. They accordingly reverted to the proposal of which he gave notice in 1903, that henceforward the bonus should be in inverse ratio to the price, and, to enable the Estates Commissioners to improve estates and redistribute them, if necessary for the advantage of the tenants, they made the additional proposal that the bonus should be paid only when sales were made to the Commissioners. The landlords were warned four years ago by the provision in the Act of 1903 to which he had referred that if they sought to obtain a very high price and at the same time to pocket the bonus, some such change as this would be made, and they thought it was high time now to make the bonus, before it was exhausted, what it was intended to be by Parliament. He had now gone through the principal provisions of the Bill as far as land purchase was concerned. It remained for him to say a few words regarding the proposed Amendments of the Land Law Acts. They proposed to reduce the satutory term of fifteen years to ten. It might be sufficient to say in defence of that proposal that it was one of the recommendations of the Select Committee over which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose presided some years ago. They proposed to abolish the right of the landlord to buy in at a price lower than what might be obtained in the open market a tenancy which was put up for sale. It was manifestly unjust that that right should exist. They proposed to repeal what was properly and truly called the "eviction-made-easy" section of the Act of 1887. It was their firm conviction that that provision was responsible for the great majority of the cases in which old tenancies had been broken and their owners thereby deprived of the right to get a fair rent fixed. They proposed that the presumption regarding improvements should be made universal in favour of the tenants. That provision would simply give legal effect to what was the notorious fact in ninety-nine out of every hundred cases that came before the tribunals which fixed rents. Finally, they proposed, by giving a certain class of future tenants the right to fix fair rents, to undo the most disastrous effect of hard and unjust evictions which were made possible mainly by the eviction-made-easy provision which he had just mentioned. He had now to say a few words in anticipation of some objections which might be made to the main and certainly the most far-reaching provision in the Bill, that, namely, regarding compulsory sale and purchase. It might be objected that the machinery provided for carrying out compulsory sales was not adequate. He did not admit anything of the kind. They had deliberately avoided as too cumbrous and expensive such machinery as that provided under the Land Clauses Acts. But, as a matter of fact, the principle on which that machinery was constructed—namely, that independent arbitrators should fix the price—was the very principle of the existing machinery for carrying out sales of which they availed themselves. The Estates Commissioners were a body independent in the same sense in which an arbitrator so-called was independent, and even at present they practically fixed the price, or might do so, in cases of sales outside the zones. If the compulsory principle was applied, they would do exactly the same sort of work as they were doing now in those cases, and if they wanted further assistance the Treasury might provide it. A more important objection that might be made was that such an operation as universal compulsory sale could not be financed. That was the objection taken by the late Prime Minister in 1901 when it was suggested that £120,000,000 would be required. He said that it would be political lunacy to talk of such a thing, though two years after he had become sufficient of a political lunatic as to give his consent to an Act which contemplated an advance of £112,000,000. But he ventured to say that to raise this financial objection was to raise a bogey. In the first place, under this Bill all the land of Ireland now left unsold would not be sold compulsorily. In the second place, the sale of such land as was liable to compulsory sale could not possibly be completed in a year or two years or five years, or even in a longer period. The Treasury at present interposed delays that had astonished most persons, and their resources in creating fresh causes of delay were not exhausted. Besides, the distribution of the purchase money was not, as many landlords and tenants knew, an easy matter or one shortly dealt with. Even as it was, it took years before it was completed, and not till the final order of the Land Commission on that subject was made need the advance be made by the Treasury. At the present moment, without compulsion, but with the zones in operation, which, so far as the Treasury was concerned, had much the same result, there was over £1,000,000 intended for land purchase lying in bank unused. The objection was, he repeated, a bogey. Compulsory sale and purchase, so far as it could operate under this Bill, would not be a short operation; but the difference it would make was that it would absolutely secure that every perch of land required to be sold to occupying proprietors would pass, at all events long before the present generation had passed away, into such hands. The Irish land question was not yet solved. He lamented the fact because that question blocked, more or less, the way to all other reforms on which the Irish nation was bent. They desired sincerely to solve it as soon as possible without injustice to a single landlord in Ireland; and with that desire they presented this Bill to the judgment of Parliament.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH (Fermanagh, N.) said he did not think that at the present time there was money ready to pay any man whose property might be taken from him. He believed in land purchase in Ireland, and he had done so since the Act of 1870 was passed. Since then it had become more and more inevitable by each of the almost annual Land Acts which had been passed. That was the only way out of the morass into which the land question in Ireland had got—the only way to terminate the dual ownership which had been working so unfortunately. He believed in the principle of compulsory purchase as a means of ending the question in all cases where it could be shown that there had been a reasonable effort to bring about voluntary purchase and the effort had failed to accomplish the desired end, and where the persons whose lands were compulsorily taken could be paid in prompt cash. But to take lands from a man who did not wish to sell and leave him to wait years for his money was essentially unjust; and, further—even in the interests of a prompt settlement—no man ought to be compelled to sell against his will until he had had a fair chance to sell at a reasonable price and the money was ready to pay him. The Bill now before the House would retard and not accelerate land purchase, involve disputes and the hearing of cases in court with attendant costs and delay, and was an attempt to break through the fundamental principle of the Act of 1903—by far the most successful of all Irish land legislation. The basis on which the Purchase Act of 1903 was passed with the assent and approval of all parties in Ireland was that in sales under the Act the price should, with the bonus percentage, be such as to secure to the landlord his present net income less the cost of collection. The Land Conference recommended that basis, and the provisions of the Act were, if fairly and properly used by landlords and tenants, well calculated to settle the Irish land question. It was regarded hopefully as a treaty of peace, and a vast number of sales were arranged under its provisions in the first two months after it came into force. Amongst other landlords who sold estates was the hon. Member for Waterford, who obtained a very satisfactory price for an estate of which he was the owner as defined by the Act. Unfortunately the treaty of peace was not fairly observed. An influential section of the Nationalist Party, backed by an important newspaper, set itself to advise the tenants of Ireland to offer prices very much lower than Land Conference terms, and ever since persistent attempts had been made to get rid of, or render unworkable, certain provisions of the Act, more particularly the zone system, by which alone it was possible for a landlord willing to sell his estate to make a definite bargain within the limits of the zones as to the amount of the purchase money he was to receive. If the zone system were done away with he believed the greatest possible blow would be dealt at the sale of land in Ireland. No man cared to offer for sale his whole estate at a price to be settled by somebody else, particularly if he had not the smallest confidence in the somebody else, and believed that he would be actuated by political pressure or other motive to offer an insufficient price. He would not particularise what those motives might be. The earlier Purchase Acts no doubt left it to the Land Commission to decide how much of the agreed price they would advance; but they dealt only with the sale of single holdings separately, and it was quite a common thing for landlords to refuse to sell any holding where the sum sanctioned was in their opinion too small. Many a tenant thereby lost a chance of buying at a price he was quite content with. The Act of 1903 dealt with the sale of whole estates, and the Estates Commission refused to deal with less than an estate; and, therefore, the landlord could not sell one holding and retain another according as the prices sanctioned by the Estates Commissioners were, or were not, satisfactory to him. It must be all or none. The zone system was of the greatest value in enabling both landlords and tenants to agree definitely on a price they considered fair, and binding the Estates Commission to advance it provided it was shown to the Land Commission that the public who were advancing the money were protected by the price being within the limits of what were called the zones—neither too high nor too low. The vast majority of landlords had been quite willing to sell on the terms of the Act. Already about one-third of the tenanted land of Ireland had come under its operation in the three-and-a-half years the Act had been in force. The sales would be even faster but for the terrible delay in getting paid, which had resulted, from the very success of the Act, in crowding the Court of the Commission, and the state of the money market, which compelled the Treasury to hold back from supplying funds. There were few, if any, landlords who would not accept the terms obtained in the case of the estate of the hon. Member for Waterford. To interfere with the zone system would, he was perfectly certain, put a serious stop on sales. It would also prevent the application of the principle of compulsory purchase in which with proper safeguards he was an entire believer. If any landlords refused to negotiate for sale on Land Conference terms when there was a prospect of reasonably prompt payment of the purchase money, he considered that in the interests of the country, the tenants, and themselves, they should be compelled to sell their tenanted lands. He thought this Bill would delay and not acclerate the application of compulsory purchase. The Bill, in addition to the abolition of the zones, contained a compulsory purchase section, but it would be unworkable. It did not deal with how the money was to be got promptly, and surely there could be no compulsion to sell unless there was money available to pay. The very fact that this block had occurred was preventing the sale of land to-day. As soon as the block was removed and there was a probability of getting a sale he had no doubt that the Estate Commissioners would be fed with applications for sale under the Land Act of 1903. The existence of encumbrances on estates in Ireland rendered it impossible for the landlord in many cases to sell, seeing he could only get a price which would yield him 3½ per cent. while he had to pay interest at the rate of 4, 5, and 6 per cent on the encumbrances. If the zones were abolished more estates would come into the market for sale to the tenants. It seemed to be rather an idle suggestion that there should be at present compulsory purchase, until it had been shown that the landlords had had a reasonable chance of carrying out a voluntary sale. At the present time there were a great many landlords who had not had an opportunity of sale by voluntary agreement owing to the enormous delay caused by the very success of the Land Act of 1903. As to untenanted land, it was proposed by the Bill that it should be purchased at a price to be fixed by the persons who were to become the purchasers. He would not object to buy land even in Ireland on those terms. It appeared to him that that amounted to pure confiscation. On many of those lands there were no tenants—[AN HON. MEMBER: That is untrue.]; on large areas there had never been any tenants; there was no question of tenants' rights or tenants' improvements. [NATIONALIST cries of "Oh, oh."] On portions of them there never had been any tenants or tenants' improvements.

MR. REDDY (King's County, Birr): That is false.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R. Barkston Ash) said that the hon. Member for King's County had twice interrupted, saying that one statement of the hon. Member for Fermanagh was untrue and that another was false. Was that in order?

*MR. SPEAKER said that it was not in order. The hon. Member might use the term that the statement was inaccurate.

*MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH said he did not desire to get into any controversy with the hon. Gentleman. What he maintained was that large parts of those untenanted lands had never been in possession of tenants. There was, therefore, no question of tenants' right or of tenants' improvements. Mr. Parnell used to say that Ireland had need of all her sons; and he had read speeches by prominent Nationalists expressing the hope that landlords who had sold to their tenants would continue to live in Ireland on their own lands. The clause in this Bill for providing for their compulsory expropriation at any price the Estates Commission might choose to offer was a curious commentary on that pious hope—a reminder how loyalists of all sorts would be treated by an Irish elective Assembly. And the Bill also proposed to expropriate tenants of non-residential holdings. He was perfectly well aware that in parts of Ireland, more particularly in the west, with which he had been all his life connected, there was pressing need of more land and better land for the people. No one regretted more than he did that economic causes had led to the growth of large grazing farms, and that legislation, such as the Land Act of 1881, had greatly increased the evil by making owners prefer keeping large grazing farms in their own hands as a source of revenue to smaller tillage holdings in the hands of tenants, which involved almost perennial litigation with regard to fixing rent, etc. Was it just that owners of grass lands, whether landlords or tenants, should be compelled to part with them for the benefit of the smaller holders? Let the Congested Districts Board be authorised and be provided with funds to enable them to offer a fair price and they would get plenty of land. He believed there were few if any western landlords who would not be delighted to reduce to a minumun their ownership of land if they could only do so without a loss of income which they could not afford to incur. He did not believe any landlord in the west would refuse to accept the twenty-four and a half years purchase which the hon. Member for Waterford obtained.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): That statement has been made before and publicly contradicted. The figures of the Land Commission have been published more than once. The statement is wholly untrue.

*MR. FETHERSTONHAUGH said that of course he accepted the statement which the hon. Member for Waterford had made. But at any rate the purchase price that the hon. and learned Member had obtained was an exceedingly satisfactory one. There would be abundance of land in the West of Ireland to be obtained if the Congested District Board had the funds to offer a similar price. To ask landowners to sell these lands not at such a price as might be agreed upon but at the valuation of the Congested Districts Board, or, worse still, of the Estates Commissioners, was unjust. There was another provision in the Bill of which he desired to speak, and that was the provision to increase the bonus payable to the vendor in proportion to the lowness of the figure at which he agreed to sell. He believed that that extraordinary idea was suggested by one of the Estates Commissioners in his evidence before the Viceregal Commission. To a lawyer's mind the whole arrangement as to bonus provided by the Act of 1903 was a very doubtful one when it was considered how many vendors of land were limited owners. It was a sort of legislative bribe to owners to sell, even if they were only tenants for life, as they thereby got the bonus percentage for themselves. The Act of 1903 carefully guarded against abuse by the zone system of prices, whereas the present Bill went in quite a contrary direction. It held out a direct bribe to the limited owner to sacrifice the interests of those in remainder. The cheaper the tenant for life agreed to sacrifice the estate the more he put into his own pocket. An old tenant for life, whose interest from age and encumbrances might be merely nominal, could by selling the property at fifteen years purchase get a personal gift of 15 per cent. of the price; while a conscientious tenant for life who stood out for twenty-three years purchase, less than the hon. Member for Waterford got, and less than Land Conference terms, would get no bonus at all. Such was the idea of an Estates Commissioner, whose decision on prices the Bill proposed to impose on owners. Surely he could not have realised the effect of his words when he suggested such an idea. He (Mr. Fetherstonhaugh) intended to vote for compulsory purchase of tenanted lands. He would vote for any amendment of the Act of 1903 that was well calculated to carry out the purpose and intention of that Act, but he could not vote for such expropriation of untenanted lands as the Bill proposed, nor for any clause that offered bribes to limited owners to commit fraud on those who came after them. He begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said the admirable speech of the hon. Member for North Dublin who seconded the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill had certainly made the task of those who followed him in support of the Bill very much easier than it might have been, because he had relieved them of the necessity of endeavouring to explain any of its provisions. The Bill was undoubtedly a comprehensive one. It dealt with a great many points of the Irish land question, which, as the hon. Member for North Dublin had truly said, was not settled or nearly settled. At the outset he wished to offer a word of explanation. There were two very important aspects of the Irish land question with which this Bill did not attempt to deal—the finance of Irish land system and the administration of the Acts. They had deliberately abstained from including in their Bill either of those great subjects, because they were really subjects for a Government measure, and a private Member's Bill could hardly usefully attempt to deal with them, although they were questions of vital importance. The financial position of Irish land purchase was at present in an impossible condition. It was impossible for the Government, in his opinion, to leave things as they stood. Ireland had been startled within the last few weeks by the large demands which had been made upon the ratepayers of the country to meet deficiencies in the land system of finance, which it seemed the Treasury had been obliged to take a fortnight to explain. They could not explain it in reply to a Question, and it was a most astonishing condition of things that that should be the case. The Treasury must have ordered these demands to be made on the Irish ratepayers and yet they were unable to explain why. He thought the reason they delayed answering was that they knew that the storm of indignation which would be raised in Ireland would be very great indeed, and they were considering what was the most plausible answer they could give. The ratepayers of Ireland could not say, however, that they had not been warned and repeatedly warned. There was hardly a Member sitting around him who had not in the last three years warned the ratepayers and the tenants of Ireland that they were not justified as Irishmen in assenting to these extravagant prices, because by so doing they were putting a burden on the ratepayers which would bankrupt and destroy the whole community. In his opinion these demands were only the first few raindrops of the coming storm in regard to the finance of Irish land, and the whole public of Ireland, and not the tenants alone, were threatened with financial demands which would be infinitely in excess of the capacity of the country to meet. In his opinion the Government ought to appoint some expert Committee of inquiry, with representatives of all the interests concerned, including, of course, the Treasury and the ratepayers of Ireland, to inquire into the narrow subject of the soundness or unsoundness of the financial arrangements in respect of land and to report without delay. It was unnecessary for him to recapitulate the main features of the Bill. Its object was, first, the abolition of the zones; secondly, the organisation of the bonus on a rational and just basis, so that it might carry out the intention of Parliament; and, thirdly, the provision of compulsory powers. And then there was the second part of the Bill, to which he attached little less importance than to the first part, as it removed certain grievances in the rent fixing and general arrangements of the Land Court. These were grievances which had been again and again protested against by Irish Nationalist Members. The promoters of the Bill did not make their proposals with any intention or expectation that the old dual ownership system and the rent-fixing system would be revived as against the system of purchase and sale. They had no such expectation, and they held that it was essential to the just and sound working of the provisions of sale which were being carried out that access to the Land Courts under fair conditions should not be denied to the people. Thus, those landlords who were seeking to force people to pay unreasonable prices for their holdings by the use of the machinery of intimidation and pressure now in their hands would have notice that the tenants had an alternative policy; if they did not get fair terms of purchase they would be able to go to the Land Court which was set up by Mr. Gladstone for their emancipation. That was the reason why the promoters of the Bill proposed the necessary alterations in the rent-fixing portion of the Land Court. He believed that if these amendments were introduced into the law it would not have the result which some people feared, of producing an immense crop of demands for judicial rents. It would emancipate the people of Ireland from the intimidation and pressure to which they were subjected by the landlords. The first great provision of the Bill, to which he attached primary importance, was that abolishing the zones. He never had any doubt in his mind as to what the effect of the zone system would be. He had always held and said, while the Bill of 1903 was going through the House and ever since, that the zones combined with the reduction in the rate of interest on the money advanced for purchase and the approval of the reduction of the sinking fund, would result in an enormous and dangerous rise in the prices paid for Irish land. That rise was dangerous to the Irish public, dangerous to the tenant, and in the long run, it would be dangerous to the Treasury, because, although he agreed with the hon. Member for North Dublin that the Treasury had fenced itself round with a triple wall of Irish security before loss could fall upon it, did anybody believe if all the tenantry in the west and other portions of Ireland were reduced to begging and were unable to pay their rent that, in spite of the triple wall, the Treasury would not have to bear some loss? All these elements, therefore, were interested in a sound system of finance. He noticed long before the Act of 1903 was proposed that every year at the landlords' conference the first article of their creed was the abolition of inspection for security, and he said to himself that even if his own moderate intelligence and acquaintance with arithmetic and finance did not inform him, these gentlemen knew what they were about, and if they were so exceedingly anxious for the abolition of inspection for security, they must have an object in putting it in the forefront of their policy. What had been the operation of the Land Purchase Acts up to now? This was an ordinary everyday transaction which was constantly taking place under his own eyes. In regard to a purchase transaction the landlord very often put on pressure in order to induce a tenant to accept his terms. There might be arrears, there was the hanging gale, and there might be a threat to deprive a man of turbary or one of the other innumerable means possessed by Irish landlords for coercing their tenants. The agreement for purchase laid down a certain price, but then the Government valuer came down in order to estimate the security, and in many cases he cut the price down ten or twenty per cent. The effect was that landlords who owned similar estates in the district had ceased to attempt to squeeze the tenants, because they knew by the experience of their neighbour that if they did so they would only be put to the expense of making a new agreement, as the old agreement would be disallowed. The result was that silently and almost unobserved a certain rough standard was set up in regard to price by the Government inspectors, who were the only protectors of the tenants against the landlords, and the end was peace, because it would no longer pay the landlord to put on pressure. But the moment that condition of things was removed in consequence of the clamour of the landlords under the zone system—an abominable system—the landlords were allowed and even invited to put on all the infinite varieties of pressure which they still possessed in spite of the Land Acts. These restraints having gone it was to the landlords' distinct interest to squeeze the tenant by every means in his power to agree to the higher price. What was the result? As the hon. Member for North Dublin had said in his admirable speech, the landlords thought that the slightest reason would justify an increase in the price of agricultural land. As the consequence of these transactions the price of land in Ireland had risen in three years by six years purchase. The hon. Member had, however, understated the case, because the price of purchase of land in Ireland had risen on the average all over the country by seven years purchase. In addition to that, the bonus which the House voted in order to enable poor tenants to meet their landlords had been grasped by the latter. That very feebly stated the grievance and the injury which had been inflicted upon the tenants of Ireland. In one district the price had doubled. He could take any hon. Member to the county of Galway and show him two estates side by side, one sold under the Ashbourne Act for twelve years purchase, and the other under the 1903 Act for twenty-four years purchase, and the bonus in addition—twenty-seven years purchase. But that was not all: the forces of the law had been let loose by this Act, and in his own division three landlords were prosecuting their tenants for old arrears of rent in order to compel them to sign agreements for twenty-four years purchase of land which in his opinion was not worth seven years purchase. He would call the attention of the House to the last Report of the Estates Commissioners—an invaluable document which he wished all Englishmen would study. He asked hon. Members to look at the table which set forth the average price of land for the whole of Ireland for the five years preceding the passing of the Act of 1903. That was worked out in terms of cash, and Members should keep in mind the fact that as years went on the number of second term rents included in those purchases had rapidly increased. From 1897 to 1903 the number of second term rents must have been rapidly on the increase. These were the figures for prices of Irish land: second term and first term rents were all lumped together: in 1899 the average price was 19·4 years; in 1900, 19·1 years; in 1901, 18 years; in 1902, 16·8 years; and in 1903, 17 years. He protested against the notion that the purchase should be based on first term rents. Purchase should be based on a fair rent now, and because a man was drawing to a close of his first term rent, which ought to have come to an end under the Scottish system in seven years, and under the system recommended by the Committee of 1894, in ten years and had been unable to exercise the right of getting a second term rent he protested against the first term rent being used. What was the result of the Act? The average number of years purchase paid in case of sales by landlords direct to tenants with the bonus was equivalent to twenty-five and a half years purchase to the vendor, an increase of something like 50 per cent. on the price in the year immediately preceding the passing of the Act. It had been said, "Oh, but that does not represent the true facts of the case, because in the previous figures you are dealing with first term rents and the last with second term rents. In reality the prices now are just on a par with what they were before." He was very glad the Estates Commissioners had come down to the bedrock and given the price per acre. The average rates per acre paid for all classes of holdings sold by landlords direct to the tenant under the Land Purchase Acts before and since the passing of the Act of 1903 were as follows: Under the Act of 1885, 10·8 cash; Act of 1901, 9·2 stock; Act of 1903, 13·4 cash. That was up to 31st March, and the average rate per acre paid during the five years immediately preceding the passing of the Act of 1903 was 8·9 stock, which amounted to less than £8 in cash, against 13·4 cash paid under the Act of 1903, exclusive of bonus, which with the bonus would realise £15 per acre. The rise had not been justified by anything in the nature of agricultural values. As every farmer in Ireland knew to his bitter cost, the profits of his holding were being steadily eaten into by increased cost of labour, and he hoped in that respect they would be more eaten into. It was far more difficult to make a living out of Irish farming to-day than it was ten years ago, and yet these men were asked to pay 68 per cent. per acre more for the land than was the case before the Act of 1903 was passed. It was to put a stop to that system that they were anxious to do away with the zones. He remembered during the discussion on the Act of 1903 there was a great deal of contention as to what the effect of these zones would be. In his opinion the effect would be to raise the price of land in Ireland to twenty-five years purchase. The right hon. Member for Dover said that was an outrageous statement, and said that what the Government had in contemplation was eighteen years purchase. He (Mr. Dillon) had turned out the truer prophet. The fact was, the zones had raised the price of land to the middle point between the two zones, and that was twenty-five years purchase. But they were not without full warning as to what the intentions of the landlords were. He would read a short extract from a letter written by a leader of the moderate landlords, Mr. Lindsay Talbot Crosbie. That gentleman, writing to the Irish Times of 25th April, 1904, said—

> "It is thus perfectly clear that all the facilities afforded by the employment of State credit and all the bonus or grant in aid is given to the tenant; the tenant and the State between them have to make up the price which they have both agreed should be given to the landlords. Somewhere about twenty-eight years purchase is what the landlord requires, and it is quite immaterial to him how this is made up. If the tenant can give twenty-five years purchase and the State three—which is about what the £12,000,000 would do—the transaction will go forward."

That was the deliberate intention of Mr. Talbot Crosbie, an intention he had done his best to carry out. His idea was twenty-five years purchase from the tenant and three years from the State. Therefore he (Mr. Dillon) was perfectly justified in the forecast he made as to the effect of the zones. One great argument constantly used by landlords in Ireland was: "What right had the State to interfere in a free bargain made between the landlord and his tenant? They were agreed that the best course was to sanction the bargain." Those who took that view knew little of Irish land. That was the old argument used against Mr. Gladstone in 1881. He remembered Captain O'Callaghan when they went down and started a campaign on his estate. It was a very hot fight on the most rackrented estate in the whole of Ireland. What did Captain O'Callaghan say? He was charged with rackrenting, and he wrote a letter to the Press, and said a more grossly unjust charge was never made against an Irish landlord. He said he never rackrented his tenants. The people fixed their own rents. "I put up my farms every seven years, and the people fix their rents themselves." That was the old idea of rackrenting. The Irish tenant was not a free agent in these bargains, and until hon. Members get that into their minds they did not know the A B C of the Irish land question. The tenant was no more a free agent in settling the price of his farm than he was in settling the rent of his farm in Mr. Gladstone's time. In his own district at the present moment landlords were proceeding for rent at dates at which they never called for them before, because these people had refused to sign bargains to pay twenty-four years purchase for land that was not fit to maintain a family even if it were rent free. Therefore, he said the withdrawal of the zone system ought to be brought about. The price of Irish land had been inflated in a manner most dangerous to the Irish community and to the State. It was no wonder that hon. Members who were landlords should be enthusiastic for the Act of 1903—the only men who came off with flying colours were the Irish landlords. Hon. Members talked about their net incomes. Why, landlords now would look with contempt upon their net incomes. He would tell the House of a case that came under his notice. A man had a small estate, from which he never drew a penny of rent for fourteen years. He came over to Ireland after the Act of 1903 was passed, sold his estate, and went back to England saying that this Act was the greatest ever passed, for he was able to secure an income of £400 in gilt-edge securities with the money he received for the purchase of his estate. That was net income in the opinion of some Irish landlords. Another case, illustrating the idea of net income, was that of the Duke of Leinster, one of the first to sell on the security of £1,250,000 of the taxpayers' money. The Duke sold at a price of twenty-four and a half years purchase and he got a bonus from the State of £112,000; he promptly invested the whole sum in 4½ per cent. security, and added six or seven thousand a year to his net income.

MR. CARLILE (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): Quite right.

MR. DILLON: Yes, but was it for that that the Act of 1903 was passed? He was delighted to have that interruption. Was it for that the State advanced the money, that dukes and earls who were millionaires already should add five, six, or seven thousand a year to their net income? Let him turn to one other aspect of this zone system. Let him take an estate in the south-west of Ireland, near Castletownbere, the Pelham-Clinton estate. There the landlord demanded twenty-four years purchase. The tenants, headed by their parish priest, offered eighteen. The landlord would not listen. There was a dispute; the landlord served notice of eviction, and the tenants fortified their houses. That was a nice way to make a bargain. That was the kind of thing into which the Irish people were driven; the tenants fortified their houses and prepared for war. If they had not fortified their houses they would have been compelled to pay twenty-four years purchase, or, at least, twenty-two. Then under the new regulations which the Government substituted for the old regulations under the Land Act last March, and which had been most beneficent in their operations, the Estates Commissioners had power to offer their mediation, and they did offer it, and the landlord agreed to allow the Land Commissioners to send their inspector upon the estate. The Commissioners had no power of compulsion, and if the landlord had been like Lord Clanricarde he would have told them to go to the devil. What was the result in this case? The result was that a schedule was drawn up by the Commissioners under which the tenants were divided into classes. The higher classes were fixed at twenty years purchase, the next at nineteen years purchase, the next at eighteen years, the next at seventeen years, the next at sixteen years, and the next at fifteen years. Bridget Brennan was fixed at twelve years purchase, and Charles O'Neill at twelve years. Non-judicial rents were graded at an average of nine years, and first term rents were graded on an average up to twelve years purchase, coming down to seven and a half years purchase, and in the case of the seven and a half years purchase the poor unfortunate man, who was scraping his living out of that wild country, if his farm had not been valued, and if the tenants had not fortified their houses, would have had to pay three or four times the price——

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork County, W.) said it was owing to the intervention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover that the evictions were abandoned. He intervened between the landlord and the tenants, and Canon McDonnell and he (Mr. Gilhooly) had an interview with the agent, and if it had not been for the intervention of the right hon. Member for Dover the evictions would have been carried out.

MR. DILLON: That may be true.

MR. GILHOOLY: It is quite true.

MR. DILLON said he was not questioning the statement at all. It did not affect his argument, but rather strengthened it, because, according to that statement, it was only the refusal of the Chief Secretary to carry out the law that prevented that eviction. He humbly submitted that that was not the way to ensure respect for the law, and that it was far better for the Government so to amend the law as to cause it to do justice instead of driving unfortunate tenants into fortifying their houses in order to get justice, and then having the Chief Secretary coming in and refusing to put the law into force. Let him take another case of the operation of the zones, the case of Mr. J. D. Crosbie, in which the Court of Appeal gave judgment the other day. Mr. Crosbie acted perfectly frankly in the matter. The question was whether arrears could be added to the purchase price, and whether, having added these arrears, the landlord was to get the bonus upon the arrears as well as on the price. The Estates Commissioners thought that a large order, and the Land Judge decided against Mr. Crosbie; but it went to the Court of Appeal. The British Treasury were appalled by the idea that they were to advance British money—Irish money in reality—to pay off these irrecoverable arrears, and in addition give the bonus. What was the judgment of the Court of Appeal? They gave judgment to the effect that the Irish landlord was undoubtedly justified in adding what arrears he could get tenants to agree to pay to the purchase price, which was to be advanced by the Commissioners, and that he was entitled to the bonus on the added price. In the case of Mr. Crosbie's estate, the amount of arrears added to the purchase money was not large, and he did not say that Mr. Crosbie treated his tenants badly, but it was the principle he objected to. Outside of a lunatic asylum there never was a more outrageous principle than that in large parts of Ireland where these rents were not real rents, but were impossible rents, where, in many cases twelve, thirteen, and fourteen years arrears had been carried on over the heads of the people for years and years, the Treasury should be called upon to advance, at the risk of the Irish ratepayers, money to pay landlords those irrecoverable arrears, with the bonus in addition. That was a most monstrous condition of affairs, and it was one which, if it alone stood against the zone system, ought to damn it. In this case it was brought out that a farm on which large arrears—if he remembered rightly, amounting to £243—had accumulated, was a second term judicial rent; it was fixed so high that the man was unable to pay it, and Mr. Crosbie would have made him pay if he was able; that bad debt was to be shifted on as a burden to the ratepayers of Ireland, while the landlord walked away with twenty-four years purchase. He would give one other case illustrative of the effect of the zones, because he was really very anxious to destroy these provisions. In the case of the Baker Estate there was a large farm in the county of Tipperary, of which the rent was considerably over £200—a judicial holding—and an application came before the Commissioners for an advance of £4,500. That sum was within the zones, and that being so, the Commissioners had no right but to advance the money, without inquiry. It so happened, however, that the solicitor, residing in the City of Dublin, got alarmed before the transaction was concluded, and through no virtue of the law, which gave the Commissioners no power to interfere, but through the awakening of the conscience of the solicitor—he was glad to find some solicitors had consciences—notice was given to the Commissioners that the transaction was an unusual one, and they were invited to pronounce upon it. What was that transaction? Mr. Commissioner Bailey in giving judgment said—

> "It was admitted that the advance of £4,500 applied for by the tenant, apparently for the purpose of enabling him to purchase his holding, was made up as follows—seventeen years purchase of rent, £3,400; addition for arrears of rent, £740; and a further addition of £410 to be refunded to the tenant by the owner when the advance was made, to be used by the tenant to pay off a family charge of £350 and an old bill for £60 for rent."

It was all within the zones, and all would have been advanced but for the Dublin solicitor. Let the House observe that the zones sanctioned that; the effect would be that the credit of the State was to be used for the payment of old family charges, and that had been done on many estates. The system had been largely resorted to in Ireland when the landlord and tenant agreed to apply for twenty-five years purchase, and the landlord agreed to give back two years purchase as a bribe to the tenant. The tenant being a poor man might find that a potent argument which he could not resist, and the Irish taxpayer was sacrificed. He thought that was a corrupt arrangement, although one recognised by the Government. If that transaction on the Baker estate went through, in a case where the solicitor was, he would say, more scrupulous than most solicitors for their clients, the State would have advanced money for private purposes at 2¾ per cent., and the landlord would have obtained the bonus. If he wanted to borrow money it would be quite another story, but landlord and tenant entering into a corrupt arrangement were able to do what he had described. That was the result of the zone system in Ireland. He appealed to the Government not to allow the grass to grow under their feet in putting an end to a system which was hurtful to every class, dangerous in a general way to the community at large, and most dangerous to the well-earned reputation for honesty in making their payments which had been won by the Irish tenantry. With regard to the bonus he would say deliberately that outside of Bedlam nothing more ridiculous was ever put into action. The House would never have passed it except for the relief of a great necessity in Ireland, to oil the springs of an essential industry. It was naturally understood that the bonus was to be at least as much for the benefit of the tenant as of the landlord, but he need hardly say that that disappeared the moment the Act was passed. The tenant never benefited one farthing by it, and he greatly feared he never would. He had said that the present system was a bad system. What was the system? It was this: That the greater the price the more bonus the landlord got. The great gift of £12,000,000, intended to settle the cases of the poor tenantry in the West of Ireland, and generally to make it possible to buy out the poor estates, had been seized upon by the great landlords of Ulster and Leinster, who had obtained under it prices which would make the mouth of any English landlord water. He asserted positively that no English landlord dreamt of getting such prices. And the bonus was availed of by the landlord to squeeze the last cent out of the tenants. Their proposal was very simple: that the man who got more than twenty-three years purchase needed no inducement to sell, whereas the man who sold at a low price required the inducement. Their proposal was one which would make the bonus of some use. He would give the House one instance—a recent instance—of the way in which the bonus was being used. He had mentioned the case of the Duke of Leinster who increased his income by £7,000 a year. Was it for what happened there that the House of Commons passed the Act of 1903? Well, the Earl of Shaftesbury was selling near Belfast at the present moment, and was holding out for twenty-seven and a half years purchase, and if he got that he would at the same time obtain a bonus of 12 per cent. to reward him for the great sacrifice he was making in parting with his lands on those terms. At the same time, if the landlord of a poor estate in Connaught sold at ten or twelve years purchase he would only get half the amount of bonus. Could there be imagined a more criminal waste of the money of the State than that which was accomplished under such a system? He would now say a word about the question of compulsion. The hon. Member for Fermanagh did not undertake to oppose the principle of compulsion, but he drew a picture of the delay in the working of purchase that would be produced by the application of compulsion. He was a lawyer. Heaven protect the Irish tenants from lawyers of that kind. He drew a picture of the delay that would ensue. There was not a single iota of force in his contention. Every single condition he dwelt upon as the result of compulsion existed in the present law. The whole matter of delay or expedition in carrying through sales depended upon the efficiency and adequacy of the staff, and nothing else. In the discussion of the Act of 1903 great weight was laid on the argument with respect to zones, but they had really had no effect on the expedition of sales. He did not pretend that the land of Ireland could be sold in less than five or six years, though he was absolutely certain that it would be possible, by proper machinery, to sell the whole of the land of Ireland within, at the very outside, the next six or seven years. Until the land was sold they would have Ireland studded all over with points of disturbance, which was a most unfortunate condition in which to keep a country. The question of sales was a question of staff. Once they set the law right and doubled the number of men on the staff they would double the quantity of land sold in any single area. There was no difficulty about it, and the whole operation would not be so costly, because the entire business would be soon brought to an end. Nobody would deny that the operating cause which brought about the series of Acts of which the Act of 1903 was the culmination was the disturbed and restless state of the country. If Ireland had been composed of properties like the Leinster and Shaftesbury estates, did they suppose that they would have had all these land Bills? It was a cruel irony of fate that the very men who brought about these great legislative reforms were left in misery still and untouched by them. That was the unanswerable ground on which they claimed compulsion. Unless they had compulsion the present condition of things would go on; and those districts where land purchase was least urgently required would be precisely those districts in which the Act would operate, and the west, south-west, and north-west would be left to stew in their misery, and to create trouble and embarrassment for Chief Secretaries to come. How could a Liberal Chief Secretary face that condition of things with any degree of equanimity? These western people had suffered and fought and won for others that which was denied to them—the right to live decent, civilised lives in the land of their fathers. Could the right hon. Gentleman tell them to wait indefinitely, and that the law must be carried out? It was very difficult for the Chief Secretary, and especially a Liberal Chief Secretary, to see the law carried out. Morally speaking it would be impossible to move great armies of police to carry out the law. Yes, but in what sense to carry out the law? By enabling the landlords, who were deliberately defying the oft-repeated policy of the House, successfully to persist in their defiance, and to maintain a system which had been condemned by the moral sense of England as well as of Ireland—a condemnation which had been sealed by the great Act of 1903. The question was one which would abide no delay. They knew the state of things in the present session, and they were aware of the difficulties, but he most earnestly warned the Government that unless they held out to those western people some such definite hope as was held out by the right hon. Gentleman at the opening of the session—the results of which were more beneficial than perhaps he would ever know to the evicted tenants in Ireland—it would be impossible for Irish Members to give counsel, or if they did give counsel to enforce it upon the tenants, and it would be beyond the limits of human nature to endure what was now going on under their eyes in many instances, namely, great ranches, which within the memory of living persons were inhabited by some of the finest peasantry that ever inhabited any country, being left desolate wastes that it was appalling to see; it would be impossible to teach the people patience when these great ranches were being taken from them by the cupidity of the landlords and graziers—stolen from them, perhaps for ever.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) regretted that the hon. and learned Member for North Fermanagh had left the House, for there were one or two statements of his to which he wished to refer. The hon. Member had said first of all that some of those engaged in this warfare had practically been guilty of a breach of faith, and that he looked upon the Bill itself as nothing less than the breach of a treaty. The second statement which he made was a more extraordinary one, namely, that one of the virtues of the Act of 1903 was that it compelled whole estates to be sold and prevented their being sold in parts. There never was a greater misapprehension of the facts, and if the hon. and learned Member had been present he would have called his attention to a singular case in point. Mr. Denny, a landlord in the hon. and learned Member's own constituency of North Fermanagh, was engaged in selling his estate, upon which there were some eighty or ninety tenants. He was quite willing to sell to the whole of the tenants, save one, and that one was Mr. Edmund Mitchell. Mr. Mitchell was the oponent of the hon. and learned Gentleman at the late election, and Mr. Denny, whilst willing to sell to all his other tenants, absolutely declined to sell to Mr. Mitchell on any terms whatever. [AN HON. MEMBER: Why?] It was not for him to say why. All he had to say was that if the Estates Commissioners declined to purchase because of Mr. Mitchell being excepted—on purely political grounds, he believed—they would have to deprive eighty or ninety tenants of the benefits of purchase. There was not any doubt whatever that all over Ulster people were being left out of purchase agreements for various reasons, and it was a total mistake for the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that the Act secured the sale of estates as a whole. As to the breach of treaty, if he had arrived at many of the conclusions of Nationalist Members on this question, it was because Irish landlords had driven a coach and four through the whole of the arrangements made at the Land Conference and under the Land Act of 1903. What was the arrangement into which the Irish landlords entered when the Land Conference sat? The main arrangement was that the landlords should be secured their second term net income with a fair equivalent for the first term rent. That was accepted by the Landlords' Convention, so that the whole of the Irish landlords, as far as their organisation could bind them, agreed to those terms. That was the contract he himself had entered into as a member of the Land Conference; and that was the contract which the Irish landlords had deliberately and ruthlessly broken. They on their side had not been guilty of a breach of contract. Hon. Members opposite had not been guilty of a breach of contract in introducing this Bill. It was perfectly certain that a great measure like the Act of 1903 would require amendment. This Bill was more than amendment, he agreed; but, whatever it was more had been rendered absolutely necessary by the deliberate breach of faith on the part of the Irish landlords. Let him point out that the zones of the Land Act were not the same as the zones of the Land Conference. In the zones under the Act the price under which sales could be made without inspection was fixed at from 10 to 30 per cent. reduction on second term rents. The zones of the Land Conference were from 15 to 25 per cent. The change was radical. The 10 per cent. reduction enabled the landlord to get the advantage. The tenant never got the advantage of the 30 per cent. reduction throughout the whole progress of the Act. In Ulster estates were being sold right and left, estates belonging to Members of the House, estates belonging to men who attended the Land Conference, and who agreed to what the Conference decided. They sold at 10 per cent. reduction on second term rents. What did that mean? It meant close upon twenty-seven and a half years purchase of those rents and three years bonus in addition—thirty and a half years purchase of second term rents. Would anybody tell him, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman on the Opposition Front Bench contend, that that merely secured the landlord his second term rent? Was that carrying out the terms of the Land Act, or the terms the landlords entered into with the tenants' representatives? The Duke of Leinster's estate was only a sample; many had added thousands of pounds to their incomes by the Act of 1903, though they had covenanted before the whole country that they would be content with the terms which he had stated. That was a deliberate breach of faith on the part of the Irish landlords. On the question of compulsion he had listened to the hon. and learned Member for North Fermanagh with a great deal of interest. He was glad to think the hon. and learned Member was in favour of compulsion, though he did not think the time had come for it. He (Mr. Russell) would take a case in his own constituency—the estate of Benburb. There were 800 tenants, seven-eighths of whom were what were called loyal men. Most of them were Orangemen. He knew every family on the estate, which was a model one. There was probably not £10 of arrears on the whole place, and the tenants were fairly comfortable men. All round the estate men were buying right and left. The Benburb tenants had offered high terms, but on that estate an impossible price was asked. How long was that to continue? Had they a right to draw a ring fence of occupying owners round these men who were ready to buy but were prevented from doing so? Had a single landlord, a rich and powerful man, the power to thwart the will of Parliament and tell his tenants, "Unless you pay my price, you shall not get the privileges which your neighbours round about you have got?" When was the time for compulsion to come? That case could be matched in every part of Ulster, and the time had come for Parliament to say that the tenants should not be treated in that way, at the will of one man, who was setting aside the clear will of Parliament. Such instances made the case for compulsion. He did not deny that there were very great difficulties in the way of carrying out a complete system of land purchase. He did not doubt that there were great difficulties in the way of compulsion; he did not question the financial difficulties, but they had put their hands to the plough and they were bound to go forward. He did not take the ground that there would be trouble if something were not done. In Ulster they were not given to that sort of thing. [AN HON. MEMBER: They never do anything.] He agreed that they never did anything to bring about a change, and that was the reason he said it. They never did anything; they only reaped where others had sown. Parliament was morally bound to see this thing through, and to prevent such difficulties arising. Let him give another instance of how the Act might be evaded. He would take Section 5 of the Act, the most extraordinary section ever put into an Act of Parliament. When the Bill of 1903 was being discussed they contended that it was not fair to put non-judicial tenants, who had never had a rent fixed, on the same terms as men who had had their rent fixed, either a first or a second time. They said that those rents had never been revised, and that the principle that applied to rents which had been fixed ought not to apply to rents which had not been fixed. The then Chief Secretary opposed them, but after a very long debate, lasting more than a day, the Government consented to exempt those men, and to put them under a special clause by themselves. That was to say, they recognised that the prices ought not to be so high as in the case of rents which had been fixed. A new clause was brought up. There was all too little discussion of the Act of 1903; there was anxiety to get it passed at all hazards and costs. What happened? The clause was brought in, and it was now Section 5. It provided for the non-judicial tenants, and allowed the Estates Commissioners, after taking all the circumstances into account, to fix a fair price. It fell into the hands of the law officers of the late Government, and how did it turn out? It turned out that all the circumstances of the case and the interests of the parties merely represented the interests of the landlords and the remainderman, and that the interests of the tenants had not to be taken into account at all. What was happening? Parliament had tried to protect these men, but they were actually paying higher prices under Section 5 than under the zones. Could they be accused of being guilty of a breach of treaty if they asked that these things should be rectified? Then there was the bonus. He agreed with the Member for East Mayo that the present arrangement as to bonuses could not possibly last. Those who were engaged in the discussion outside Parliament had, some of them, contended for a bonus; but they were laughed at, and the idea that Parliament would ever give a bonus was ridiculed. But their contention in the country and when they reached the House was that the State should intervene and make up the difference between what the honest tenant could pay and what an embarrassed landlord could afford to accept. That was the principle on which the bonus was founded and passed. What had happened? Why, the landlord had taken the highest price, twenty-seven and a half years; he got all he wanted, and he collared the 12 per cent. bonus as well. The whole thing was impossible, and could not be put before any Parliament and accepted; it must be revised or go. There were other parts of the Act which he thought ought to receive more attention than they had been given. When they passed the Bill it never was intended, and they never believed that those zones would be applied to congested districts. Unquestionably the Land Conference exempted the congested districts. They specially declared that they should be subjected to altogether different treatment from the ordinary parts of the country. He spoke for himself at all events. When the Act passed he had no idea that it would be possible for the Courts so to construe it as to apply to congested districts. Yet it had taken place. If any of them wanted to have a picture of Irish landlordism, and what it was capable of, he asked them to think of Irish landlordism at the Land Conference, full of moderation, full of fair play, full of a desire to settle the question, and then tranfer themselves to the Congested Districts Commission, sitting sometimes at one place and sometimes at another; and he advised them to get a mental photograph of Mr. W. H. Boyd. He advised them to read his evidence. Mr. Boyd was representative of Irish landlords. That gentleman was adopted by the Irish Landlords' Convention, and he sat for five or six days in the witness chair, and there was no antiquated principle of Irish landlordism which he did not revive. Such men seemed to forget that they were not the owners of the soil as an English landlord was. Much of their land belonged to the tenant. The landlord got the land for nothing in the main and never did anything for it. He would be perfectly willing to agree to what he signed at the Land Conference if the landlords would keep their share of the bargain, but they had freed him from the compact because there was not a paragraph in their Report they had not destroyed.

*MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.) said he could not address the House in the stirring tones of the hon. Member for South Tyrone or of the hon. Member for East Mayo. In the few remarks he desired to make he wished to deal with the question in moderate terms. He must express his surprise at hearing the hon. Member for South Tyrone say that because of what certain landlords had done he freed himself from all the obligations, promises, and undertakings he agreed to at the time of the Land Conference. All he could say was it was a very serious and strange position for a person occupying the position of the hon. Member to take up.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I am afraid I have not made my meaning clear. What I did mean to say was that while I am still ready and willing to give an Irish landlord the privilege of his second term net income, he has broken every engagement at the Land Conference, and therefore I do not feel myself bound to stand by the Land Conference so much as I did at first.

*MR. CHARLES CRAIG said that was exactly what he understood the hon. Member for South Tyrone to say. Taken all round and not the isolated cases mentioned by the hon. Member for East Mayo and the hon. Member for South Tyrone, the landlords of Ireland as a whole had acted absolutely up to the spirit of the Land Conference and to the spirit which dictated the Act of 1903.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) asked how many landlords had sold at twenty years purchase.

*MR. CRAIG said he would tell the House what had happened in his own part of Ireland. He happened to be the landlord of a small property in Ireland, and after the Act of 1903 became law his tenants came to him and asked if he proposed to sell. He said he would, and they asked for his terms. The majority of his tenants had second term rents fixed, and those who had not he fixed by agreement for the purpose of the sale. He then offered to sell at a reduction of 20 per cent. from the second term rents, which offer was accepted. That was exactly half-way between the top and bottom limit of the zone, and his tenants agreed to those terms. That transaction was typical of the vast majority of transactions in Ireland. [NATIONALIST cries of "No."] He was quite sure that was the case. It had been admitted from the Irish benches that one of the chief objections to the zone system was that it stereotyped the middle price as the price to be paid all round. It had undoubtedly done so in the majority of cases, and landlords and tenants had agreed to an arrangement by which the land was sold at the middle price, a state of things which was contemplated by the Act of 1903.

MR. FLAVIN asked if the hon. Member contended that the Act of 1903 fixed the price at twenty-four years purchase?

*MR. CHARLES CRAIG said the Land Conference laid down that the landlord was to receive the equivalent of his net income, and a 20 per cent. reduction on the second term rents produced almost exactly that sum. If that were conceded, if it were allowed that by far the greater number of transactions which had taken place under the Act had had that effect, then there could not be any reasonable objection taken to the Act of 1903. It seemed an extraordinary thing that three years after the passing of that Act they should be asked to reverse entirely the policy which was acquiesced in at the time by all parties. He claimed that it had not been shown that the Act of 1903 had failed. There might be isolated anomalies, and it was impossible that in the administration of an Act of such magnitude it could be otherwise. His point was that the cases which had been cited did not necessarily bear the construction which had been placed upon them. Even if they assumed for the moment that they were as bad as they had been pictured it was no argument against the Act of 1903. With reference to the zone system of which the hon. Member for South Tyrone had said so much, and which he seemed to look upon as one of the worst points in the Bill, the zones were arrived at in the Conference between the landlords and tenants. Roughly speaking, since 1881 rents had on two occasions been revised in Ireland, once after the passing of the Act of 1881, and then after the lapse of fifteen years from that date. The whole question of the value of a farm was thoroughly gone into in the Land Commission Court and formed the basis and data on which the fair rent was fixed, and it was properly felt by both landlords' and tenants' representatives as well as by the Government of the day, that it was unnecessary that every estate should be re-examined, and the question of the security of the purchase money gone into a second time, and that it would only occasion expense and delay to do so. It was felt that the operation and fixing of fair rent had settled the question sufficiently clearly for all the purposes of the Act of 1903. He maintained that the Government of the day had fulfilled all the obligations upon it in seeing that the holdings were security for the money paid upon them. It was urged that the zones should be removed, and that the Government should see that the current price for land in Ireland was considerably reduced from what it was at present. That was not fair. The House of Commons three years ago and the Land Conference practically settled what was to be a reasonable price to be paid for land in Ireland. That was the chief subject discussed at the Land Conference, and in the House, and the conclusion was deliberately arrived at that a reduction of something between 20 and 40 per cent. would be the proper basis for fixing the price for land in regard to which a fair rent had only been fixed once, and something between 10 and 30 per cent. the price of land where second term rents had been fixed. That conclusion was deliberately arrived at, and there was no reason why, seeing that the decision was come to only three years ago, it should now be violently uprooted and changed by the removal of the zones. Absolutely no case in the course of the debate had been shown why that should be done. He disagreed with the hon. Member for East Mayo on the picture he had drawn of the ordinary landlord in Ireland coercing his tenants. That picture was more than exaggerated, because except in very rare cases it was absolutely untrue. The ordinary landlord in Ireland did not coerce his tenants, and even if landlords were inclined to use coercion they had not got the powers to do so, they had no weapons. But in Ireland the landlord had no desire to coerce his tenants. While he was a landlord had he possessed the desire to coerce his tenants he had no earthly power to do so. His tenants' rents were fixed once every fifteen years, and so long as they were duly paid—and they always were—he had no power over them at all. He did not know whether the picture drawn by the hon. Member for East Mayo was intended to create the impression that it was typical of the ordinary landlord in Ireland, and that he seized every opportunity of bringing pressure on his tenant to pay a higher rent than he could afford. If such a time ever existed it had passed away years ago, and now the rents were fixed by the Land Courts, which were absolutely independent of both landlord and tenant. It was hardly necessary to point out that hon. Members below the gangway represented the tenants alone in this matter. He did not claim to represent the landlords particularly, because he owed his position to the votes of a good many tenant farmers. He entered Parliament in 1903 when this question was uppermost in the minds of Irish representatives. There was a great amount of feeling on the subject in the North of Ireland at that time. The complaint of hon. Members below the gangway was not so much that the tenant was paying too much for his land, but that the landlord was getting too good a bargain. The idea now seemed to prevail that no matter what terms the tenants got, whether they were good or bad, the landlord must at all costs be prevented from making even a tolerable bargain for himself. He would have thought the object of the Nationalist Members would have been achieved if the tenant made a good bargain and acquired his farm at a reasonable price. It was distinctly understood that under the then existing circumstances something more would have to be given to the landlord than had been given in the past in order to bring about a sale. He did not think they had a right to go back now on the principle which guided the House in the passing of the Land Act of 1903. The cases in which landlords had reaped an unfair advantage from the Act of 1903 were very few and far between, and the vast bulk of them had parted with their land on terms and conditions which had left the tenants in a better position than they were before and at the same time had secured the landlords the net income they were getting before the passing of the Act. That was the proper picture to draw of the operation of the Land Act. Instead of being looked upon as a failure, the Act ought to be considered one of the most sucessful measures ever passed. With regard to the Leinster estate he deprecated that the landlord there should be able to make such a large profit out of the sale of his estate to his tenants. It was not his wish that that should happen, and he was sure it was not the wish of the House when the Act was passed. The hon. Member for East Mayo referred to the Leinster estate as a bad case and objected to the Duke of Leinster receiving £1,112,000. He agreed that that was a very large sum of money, but the hon. Member omitted to tell the House that in receiving that immense sum there were a very large number of persons who were turned from tenants to proprietors of their farms, and the annual amount payable by each of these tenants was probably reduced by from 15 to 20 per cent. Would the hon. Member for East Mayo have raised the same objection if the immense estate of the Duke of Leinster had been in the hands of five or six landlords instead of under one landlord? He claimed that the arrangements made on that estate were satisfactory because the tenants were perfectly satisfied. He did not think the House of Commons ever intended that the landlords should make a profit out of the Act. He did not think any good purpose would be served by going into the instances mentioned by the hon. Member, for, even if the facts bore the construction put upon them, they were not typical but exceptional cases, affording no ground or argument for the complete reversal of the principle embodied in the Act of 1903. The hon. Member for East Mayo had called the bonus a fatal gift. [NATIONALIST cheers.] He attributed those cheers to the intense dislike which hon. Members had of the landlords getting anything out of the land. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: They have already got too much.] The whole objection of hon. Members to the Land

Acts was not that the tenants were not getting fairly good terms, but that the landlords were getting far too good terms. If they looked at the question from that point of view they were not likely to arrive at a satisfactory solution of it. The hon. Member for North Dublin County had said that Ireland could not afford to wait any longer for compulsory powers. But even if a Bill for the compulsory acquisition of land were passed to-morrow they would have to wait a considerable number of years before they could get the purchases carried out. The argument of the opponents of the Bill was that there was no use passing the measure now when they had not even the money required by the Voluntary Act at present in force, and working wonderfully well. It was a fact that at no time since the passing of the Act of 1903 had the funds at the disposal of the Estates Commissioners been at all adequate to deal with the cases brought before them at any one moment. That was really the one unfortunate fact in connection with the Act which every Irishman who was anxious for the transfer of property from the landlords to the tenants must deeply deplore. He did not say that there had not been very fair reason for the shortness of money, but it was that fact which had deterred not only landlords, but tenants, from entering into agreements for purchase or sale of holdings. The fact that there was not sufficient money to finance the transactions made it uncertain whether, under an agreement entered into, no matter how clear or simple, the landlord would receive the money, and that the tenant would actually become the owner of the farm for two or three, or possibly five years. In the circumstances persons could not be expected to make bargains. He felt convinced that, apart from one or two exceptional cases which might either now or at a later date require some exceptional treatment, the Act of 1903 was bringing about tenant proprietorship of the land in Ireland at a rate which was at least as quick as would be secured by any compulsory system that could be introduced. With reference to any exceptional cases or districts which might exist—he had no doubt they did exist—where possible requirements were not met by the provisions of the Act of 1903 he said, "Let there be fresh legislation on fair terms." He was not a representative particularly of the landlords, although he might be called upon to champion their cause from time to time in the House of Commons, and he said that if fresh legislation was necessary to deal with the peculiarities of exceptional districts, precisely the same principle must be adhered to in dealing with those cases as was adhered to in the Act of 1903. That was to say, a landlord, whether in the west, south, or any other part of Ireland, must not be asked to part with his property unless he was properly compensated for the same. They had heard of land being sold at seven, eight, nine, or ten years purchase in the West of Ireland. He was afraid his knowledge of the West of Ireland was not sufficient to enable him to say whether those prices were proper or not, but what he said was that if a man was receiving a rental of a certain amount in the West of Ireland where, he presumed, there were fixed rents as in other parts—[NATIONALIST cries of "No"]—if a man was receiving a certain rental from his property, and if in the view of the Land Commission it was likely to be of as much value twenty years hence as to-day, and if that man was forced to sell, he should be assured of a definite income equal to the net income he was at present receiving out of the land. It was a perfectly fair thing to ask. He was certain that if the landlords in the West of Ireland or other exceptional districts were assured that they would receive an income which was approximately equal to the present second term rental, there would be no more difficulty in getting them to sell their property than in the case of landlords like himself in the North of Ireland, who had availed themselves of the Act of 1903.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHERRY, Liverpool, Exchange) said they might congratulate themselves that all the hon. Members who had taken part in the debate had advocated the continuation of the policy of selling the land of Ireland to the tenants, which was initiated so far back as 1869, which had been going on ever since, and to which the Act of 1903 gave a great impetus. The hon. Member for South Antrim had represented the Bill now before the House as a complete reversal of the Act of 1903. He did not take that view at all.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG: I said as regards the compulsory provisions of the Bill.

Mr. CHERRY said that he would deal with the Bill in detail. He could not answer in a moment questions with respect to all the matters it contained. He would endeavour to show, and the House would judge whether he succeeded, that the effect of the Bill would not be to set aside the Act of 1903, but to carry it out in its essential details. The Act of 1903 had provided great benefits for the landlords. It had given them a market where there was no market before. It had given them a bonus of 12 per cent. It had enabled money to be advanced on such reasonable terms, by enlarging the period of repayment, that tenants were induced to give larger prices than they had previously given. The average price of land had risen by six or seven years purchase since the passing of the Act of 1903. Therefore the landlords had undoubtedly obtained very great advantages in addition to the bonus. Had the purchasing tenants obtained similar advantages? [An Hon. Member: "Yes."] His hon. friend said "Yes," but he himself did not think they had. The purchasing tenants looked to purchase price with reference to the annuities paid rather than to the amount of money. Comparing the annuities before 1903 with the annuities under the Act of that year, it would be found that they were very much the same in proportion to the rent, and that the purchasing tenant was not receiving any substantial reduction. Before 1903 the annuity ran for a shorter period, and was subject to a decadal reduction. Now it ran to sixty-eight and a half years without any hope of remission. If anyone examined impartially what had happened, it was clear that enormous benefits had been conferred by Parliament, benefits which were intended by Parliament to be equally participated in by both landlords and tenants, but which had been practically monopolised by the landlords. That had been the effect of the working of the Act. He did not want to throw any discredit on landlords who had sought to get high prices, but the practical effect had been that the advantage had been obtained by the landlords and not by the tenants. He understood that the main object of the Bill now before the House was to secure a more equal distribution of the benefits. The object, as hon. Members opposite had stated, was to seek to reduce the amount of the purchase money so that some share of the benefit which was intended by Parliament for the tenants would be obtained by them. The State also had undoubtedly a great interest in the matter. The risk involved in the high rates of purchase which prevailed in some districts was a very great one, whilst that involved in the absence of any investigation as to security was also very serious. It was a matter of interest to everyone to see that the prices paid were not excessive but represented the fair value of the land. He did not propose to go through all the clauses of the Bill, but would deal with what appeared to him to be its main features and endeavour to show how far the Government considered its provisions desirable, and how far they were able to give their support to them. The effect of the first clause would be practically to abolish the zone system and to establish a system of inspection in all cases of sales, whether in the case of judicial or of ordinary tenancies. He had never been particularly enamoured of the system of zones. He had always thought that it was rather a risky transaction. The advance of money by the State in large sums without any investigation at all was a system open to the obvious danger that fraud of various kinds might be perpetrated. He believed that in some cases there had been fraud. There was nothing to prevent the tenant who was willing to help his landlord agreeing to a rent absurdly above the value of the land and getting the land on a twenty-seven years purchase, and then the two dividing the purchase money between them. Unless there was some investigation as to security a transaction of that kind might be successfully carried through. Then again rents were fixed for a period of fifteen years, and the rent-fixing authority only took those fifteen years into account. It was quite possible that in respect of turbary, at the end of fifteen years all the turf might have been entirely cut away. On a great many farms the turbary was a consideration which was taken into account. The question whether there was sufficient turbary to last fifteen years was considered, and a considerable portion of the rent was in respect of turbary which was not security. When they applied the zone the term would not be for fifteen but for sixty-eight years, and there was the risk that all the turf would be cut away and that no security would remain. That showed that the mere fact that judicial rent had been fixed at a certain sum could not be safely taken as proving that a particular holding was fit to bear for sixty-eight years annuities only 10 per cent. less than the amount of the rent. He had no hesitation in saying that some modification of the system was necessary and must be enacted by Parliament. He would suggest one modification at least as desirable, namely, that in every case where judicial rent had been fixed by agreement the Estates Commissioners should be directed to inspect the holding. Fully one-third of the judicial rents had been fixed not by the Courts but by agreement. In such cases there was no certainty whatever that the rent represented the value of the holdings as fixed by a judicial tribunal without including the tenants' improvements. Further, rents were frequently fixed by agreement between the parties in cases which were excluded from the Land Acts. The transactions so carried out sometimes involved the fixing of rents at amounts far higher than would be fixed by the Court, and that was a matter which must be considered, because the rents in such cases might have a bearing on the purchase prices. He thought also that it might be desirable to deal with the zone system. The Estates Commissioners should have discretion, if they thought right, and if they had any reason to think that the purchase price was too high, to make an investigation into the whole merits of the case. Another provision of the Bill which entirely commended itself to his mind was that which enabled and, he thought, required the Estates Commissioners, when considering a case outside the zones, to inquire into the question of the equity of the price as between landlord and tenant. As the hon. Member for East Mayo had pointed out, it had been ruled by the learned Judge that Section 5 of the Act of 1903, which directed the equity of the price to be considered before a loan was sanctioned, referred to the equity, not as between the landlord and tenant, but as between the tenant for life effecting the sale and the persons in remainder. They all knew that, in cases where there were a large number of tenants on an estate, there were some exceptional tenants who had not the same privileges as their neighbours owing to the large amount of arrears, and that great pressure was put put upon them, not only by the landlord, but by their fellow-tenants, to agree to what was more than a fair price for the holding in order to carry through the sale of the whole estate. He thought that was a case in which the equity of the price ought to be investigated, and he could see no reasonable objection in point of law against its being done. As to the bonus, it had been pointed out that the effect of the present arrangements was actually to stimulate a man to obtain as high a rent as he could. Was that just? Was it reasonable and right that a man should get a higher bonus because he got a high price for his land? If the bonus was intended to help the tenant to buy as well as the landlord to sell, the logical thing to do was to make the bonus vary inversely with the number of years purchase obtained. But if Parliament did not sanction such a radical change, he thought it was desirable that there should be some limit to the number of years purchase on which the bonus was paid, say up to twenty-seven or twenty-eight years. Under the Act of 1903 the scale of bonus came up for consideration every five years, and, therefore, it would have to be considered next year. When the matter did arise the question of the distribution and the payment of the bonus would be considered, and the Government would endeavour so to use the money available for the bonus as to promote its distribution in those parts of the country where the sales were most wanted. The parts that most wanted it on the ground of the poverty of the people were generally the last to obtain it. In the prosperous counties like Kildare and the North of Ireland tenants were anxious to take advantage of the legislation, and the landlords were anxious to sell; but in the West and the South it had been found difficult to carry out a voluntary arrangement. It was desirable that something should be done, and he hoped something would be done to alter the system. As to the question of compulsion, those who voted in favour of the principle when in opposition were not going to shrink when in power from putting it in force. The principle was in full operation now in several respects; and he did not think any great complaint had been made. A Royal Commission was appointed by the late Government to consider the case of Trinity College. It was presided over by Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, and there were two other Commissioners equally learned and influential. Some of their recommendations were distinctly in favour of compulsory purchase, in order to get rid of the tangle of dual ownership. If the principle was applied in that case, what arguments could there be against extending it to other cases also? If ever there was a case in which the principle should be applied, it was to those congested districts in the West of Ireland where the holdings were so small that people could not possibly live upon them, and where immediately adjoining them were large ranches of grazing land fit for distribution. As regarded compulsion it had been pointed out that it was a question of money. The Government could not commit itself to an immediate application of the principle of compulsion without providing the means. Money must be provided by the Treasury, and the machinery, troublesome and difficult, must also be provided by Parliament. So far as the present year was concerned, if this Bill was fortunate enough to pass, the question of the compulsion as regarded direct sales certainly could not be entertained. He thought all were agreed that the sales actually agreed upon under the Land Commission ought to be completed before they applied the principle to other cases. As regarded untenanted lands in congested districts the case was quite different. A Royal Commission was now sitting with reference to that matter, and, he hoped, would shortly publish its Report. If that Report recommended the adoption of compulsion as the necessary means of getting possession of a sufficient amount of land to carry out the objects which the Commission recommended, the Government would not hesitate to adopt their recommendations and put them in force as far as they could possibly do so. But pending the Report of the Commission he did not suppose that any hon. Member would expect the Government to pledge themselves to adopt the principle even as regarded this matter. In reference to sporting rights, he thought there was a great deal to be said for the view that they should in all cases be conveyed with the land to the purchasing tenant. The reservation of sporting rights was apt to cause friction and annoyance, and he did not see why they should be dealt with differently from other rights attaching to the land. He thought that the good relations between the farmer landlord and the farmer tenant would be better promoted by the landlord letting the sporting rights go to the tenant. Already in some cases, in the county of Waterford, a good deal of trouble and annoyance had been caused by the reservation of the sporting rights. It was all a question of price, and the price should be arranged on the assumption that all rights should pass. As to minerals, he did not understand on what principle the Act of 1903 provided that a man who had sold his property out and out and had been paid full value should, perhaps twenty years hence, on the discovery of coal or other minerals under the land, be entitled to 25 per cent. of the gross profits of the working of those minerals. What claim had he to the 25 per cent? He had sold the land on the assumption that the mineral rights were of no value. Surely if there was a loss to the ratepayers in Ireland through the financing of the Land Act the proceeds of any minerals subsequently discovered ought to be applied towards that rather than to the former owner. It seemed to him a reasonable thing that such rights should be used not for the benefit of the former owner but for the benefit of the public generally. Of course existing rights must not be interfered with, but future rights ought to be vested in the Land Commission for the purpose of financing the Act. With reference to the amendment of the Land Law Acts and the rent-fixing portions of the Bill, the question of improvements was at the very root of the Irish land question, and they were bound to see that in the fixing of rents as well as in the sales of property every tenant secured the full benefit of all improvements made by him or by his predecessor. In no case should the rent be fixed on improvements made by the tenant, and the tenant be compelled to purchase improvements which he had himself made. Power should be given to the Commissioners to investigate each case within or outside the zones to see whether the rent was fair and reasonable, and whether the improvements on the holding had been included in the purchase price or not. Another provision which was harmless and against which not a word had been said, was that which provided that tenants who had lost the status of present tenants by eviction, should for the future be treated as present tenants and enabled to have fair rents fixed. He could see no reasonable objection to that. He did not suppose there were many such cases—[An Hon. Member: There are between 50,000 and 60,000 of them]—but whether many or few, he saw no reason why a man who was a present tenant and who forfeited that position owing to default in paying rent—for which he might not have been to blame—should not be allowed to have a fair rent fixed, and the purchase price fixed on the fair rent. It was also proposed to repeal Section 7 of the Act, but that was not a matter upon which he thought he ought to make any pronouncement of policy at that moment. The House was fully engaged, and he feared the chances of the Bill passing this session were very slight; but the Government would support the Second Reading, because they approved the principle contained in the Bill, and because, in their opinion, it not only did not contradict, but carried out, the intentions of the Legislature in passing the Act of 1903, and would promote the wellbeing of Ireland in the future.

Mr. JAMES CAMPBELL (Dublin University) said it would be a very unwelcome and startling piece of news to the English taxpayer to find to-morrow morning, when he read his paper, that the arrangement contained in the Land Purchase Act of 1903, which he was led to believe was to be a final settlement of the difficult and complicated question of land purchase in Ireland, and on the faith of which he consented to lend £100,000,000 to Ireland and to give as a free gift £12,000,000, was to be no final settlement after all, but an instalment leading up to the larger policy of confiscation and compulsion. It was certainly not a little startling that, within four years of the passage of the Land Purchase Act as the result of what was, at any rate, believed to be a concensus of opinion on all sides of the House that it contained within it the materials for an ultimate and final settlement of the question, those who took part in that arrangement should be told, not merely by hon. Members below the gangway from Ireland, but also from the lips of the representative of His Majesty's Government, that practically the settlement arrived at in 1903 was now to be torn up and treated as waste paper. He had gone through every section of this Bill, and he ventured to say that there was not one but bore upon it the stamp of injustice and confiscation. What were the main and essential elements of the arrangement or compromise, arrived at in 1903, with the approval and almost the applause of all sections of the House? The essential elements of the Land Purchase Act of 1903 were, first the absence of compulsion, secondly, the system of zones, and thirdly, the bonus. These three things were the essential and material conditions for the successful passing of that measure, and they were all the special subject of attack in the present Bill — an attack made with the approval of his right hon. friend opposite. Yet the right hon. Gentleman had told them that the effect of this Bill, the express object of which was to disrupt and disturb everything which was arranged, and as they thought concluded, in 1903, would be simply to supplement and carry out the policy of the Land Act of 1903. What was the purpose of the zones? In the first place, it was to do away with the necessity for all that complicated legal investigation and judicial decision which had been found to clog to such an extent the operation of the ordinary rent fixing Acts passed prior to 1903, and the hon. Member for Waterford, standing up in his place to comment on the Land Purchase Act, had stated that in his opinion the great merit of the proposal was that the tribunal or body of gentlemen to whom the duties under the Act were to be entrusted were to have no judicial authority, but were to be non-judicial and purely administrative. Unfortunately, that was not the view these gentlemen took of their own functions, and their desire to acquire judicial discretion and power for themselves resulted in a majority of the Estates Commissioners from the first displaying a most active and patent hostility to the zones. By the zones, it was proposed to get rid, by a sort of automatic system based upon fair and reasonable lines, of the necessity for all these judicial investigations. How was it proposed to do that? First of all, he would ask hon. Members opposite to recollect, what perhaps had been forgotten, that the system of the zones applied only to the purchasing tenants who had had judicial rents fixed, and the proposal was that, in the case of tenants who had had their rents fixed on only one occasion, in order that the purchase should go through automatically and without inspection, they should get a further reduction of at least 20 per cent. on their judicial rent. In other words, every tenant coming under Section 1 of the Land Purchase Act of 1903 if he was a first term tenant was to get at least 40 per cent. off his rackrent, 20 per cent. being taken off by the fixing of the first term, and 20 per cent. under the Act of 1903. That was not a bad bargain for a purchasing tenant, because he was to start in the first place with an immediate reduction on his original rent of 40 per cent. and after a certain period of time the rent, which took the shape of an annuity, would cease altogether. But more than that, what was to be the bargain in the case of the second term tenant, whose purchase was to pass through automatically under Section 1 of the Act? Speaking in round numbers, practically the assumption was that by the first fixing of the rent the tenant got a reduction of 20 per cent., and that he got a somewhat similar reduction on the second term. Therefore, if he was a second term tenant, coming in under the zone, he was to get a further reduction of at least 10 per cent. on his rent, so that his original rent was to be reduced by 50 per cent. and the rent was to be changed at that figure into an annuity which was to cease after a certain number of years. It was suggested that all that was done in the interests of the landlord. It was done in the interests of both landlord and tenant. It was part of the arrangement. He would not say that that arrangement was assented to by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, because he agreed that the hon. Member for East Mayo was a bitter opponent of the zone system from the first, but on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite there was no protest of any sort or kind raised against the system incorporated in the first section of the Act of 1903. What was the result of that? The system had been attacked because by virtue of it the landlords had got a certain number of years purchase in excess of those which prevailed before the Act of 1903 was passed. Everybody who knew anything about Ireland was aware of the real cause and the true explanation of that state of things.

It was given in the most graphic way in which it could be given by the hon. and learned Member for Waterford himself, who in season and out of season had with conspicuous courage, loyalty, and honour, stood by what he believed to be the spirit of the Land Conference and the spirit manifested by all Parties in the House when they passed the Act of 1903. In addressing a meeting in county Wicklow, in that year, the hon. and learned Gentleman said that he met a farmer who said to him—

> "We farmers do not think we shall gain much by this Land Purchase Act of yours, because we have got to give twenty-two or twenty-three years purchase, when we could under the Ashbourne Acts have purchased for eighteen years."

The hon. and learned Gentlemen said he asked the farmer why he did not purchase under the Ashbourne Acts, and the farmer said—

> "My landlord would not sell."

That was the real explanation of the matter, and as the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone—whom he was glad to welcome back to the House after his severe illness and who always contributed so effectively to debate—had pointed out, the main reason why land purchase before the Act had almost ceased in Ireland was that the landlords were not willing to sell at the prevalent prices. The hon. Member had said that the bankrupt estates could be got rid of by eighteen years purchase, as could also the estates of landlords who had only a small property in Ireland as compared with large estates elsewhere and who, being wealthy, wanted to get out of the country. That class of landlord did not care whether it was seventeen, eighteen, or nineteen years purchase, but now those two sets of landlords had been exhausted. They had got rid of the bankrupt landlords and the landlords who were prepared to sacrifice their property with a view of getting out of the country, and they now had to deal with the men who wanted to get a fair price for their property. Therefore the prices prevalent before the Act of 1903 could no longer be relied on, and some fresh inducement was required to bring the property of the remaining landlords into the market. It was with that express view and object that the system of bonus was devised and introduced into the Irish purchase legislation—in order to give to the solvent landlord who hitherto had been unwilling to sell at the prevalent prices an inducement to part with his property. Yet the hon. Member for East Mayo had in that debate denounced the bonus, because, forsooth, it had gone into the pockets of solvent landlords.

Mr. DILLON said he did not denounce the bonus, but he denounced the distribution of it.

Mr. JAMES CAMPBELL said that was precisely the point he was making. The hon. Member denounced the bonus because it went into the pockets of the landlords—into the pockets of the Duke of Leinster, and other persons who the hon. Gentleman said had no right or claim to it. But it was impossible to please the hon. Member. "Hit high or hit low," he never was satisfied. He said there was no reason why the Duke of Leinster should have this money, because he was a wealthy man, but then he complained in regard to the case of a landlord who had parted with his property, and had had to leave the country with a sum which was only capable of producing £100 a year. There was no satisfying him, and the result was that the Act of 1903 was to be torn into shreds. When hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway brought in Bills he always looked carefully into them to see whether there was anything with which he could agree, and he did not in this Bill find anything. There was one point made by the hon. Member for East Mayo which was a grave and serious matter, but which was unfortunately not in this Bill. He referred to the claim made by the Treasury in certain districts of Ireland in regard to the alleged losses on land stock. Speaking from his recollection of the Act of 1903, the hon. Member said he believed that to be a breach of faith. So far as he himself understood the financial provisions of that Act, however, it amounted to this, that the county councils were only to be responsible for the burden when they neglected to obtain these instalments. He did not think the Act made the county council liable to make good the loss sustained in floating land stock. The most extraordinary feature of this Bill was that for the first time in Irish legislation it introduced coercion with regard to the Irish tenant. He did not know if hon. Members had read the Bill, but he thought it would come as a surprise to them that by one section of it power was taken to buy the holding of a tenant who did not live on it. As everyone knew, in Ireland many farmers lived in the villages, and any tenant who lived in a village or town and held a farm in the vicinity might have that farm under the compulsory powers of this Bill purchased compulsorily by the Estates Commissioners. [NATIONALIST cries of "No."] By one section power was to be conferred on the Land Commission compulsorily to purchase the holding of any tenant who did not live on it.

MR. DILLON said the hon. Member was quite wrong.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL assured the hon. Member for East Mayo that he was absolutely right.

MR. CLANCY: You should read the Bill.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL said he proposed to do so. Clause 3, Section 1, provided that the Land Commission should have power, for the purpose of providing parcels of land, to purchase "any untenanted land not being land purchased under the Land Purchase Acts, or may purchase any tenanted land on which the tenant does not actually reside." [NATIONALIST cries of "Go on."] There was nothing further in the section.

MR. DILLON said the hon. Member was absolutely wrong. The Bill was perfectly clear—"or may purchase any tenanted land on which the tenant does not actually reside, or which does not adjoin, or is not ordinarily used in conjunction with the holding on which he so resides, and on which a fair rent cannot be fixed under the Land Law Acts."

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL said he failed to see the force of the interruption. His point remained exactly where it was before the interruption. [Cries of "No."] He had no hope of reaching the intelligence of some hon. Gentlemen, but there were some who had some intelligence and anyone who understood the King's English would see at once that two cases were dealt with—first, where the tenant did not live on the holding, and, secondly, where he had another holding which was not used in conjunction with the one on which he lived. Those were the two cases, and in either of them power was given to the Land Commission to buy it up against the tenant's will. But coercion was also applied in respect to sporting rights. If a tenant purchased to-day and left to the landlord the sporting rights the landlord gave something more. The Bill proposed that in every case, whether he liked it or not, the tenant should be compelled to take over the sporting rights, the only reservation being that he could reserve them to the landlord for the landlord's life. Fine preservers of game the tenants would be! Did hon. Gentlemen think in the case of a tenant with four or five acres, on which he lived when he was not away at work in the fields of England or elsewhere, that that tenant would ever become a preserver of game? If that section was carried there would be an end to game preservation in Ireland. As to the bonus, the Bill contained the provision that the smaller the purchase price the greater the bonus, and there was no provision to protect the remainderman from this manifest bribe. A more unjust or dishonest suggestion it would be impossible to conceive. Under the Act of 1903 any dispute as to easements or boundaries was by agreement to be referred to the Land Commission. The Bill proposed to take away that voluntary jurisdiction and to make it obligatory upon any party to a dispute to submit it to the Commission, if any one person applied for a hearing; and that was proposed by the very same hon. Gentleman who in 1903 hailed the Act of that year with such delight because it created a non-judicial body with nothing but administrative functions. The real cause of the late delay in land purchase was not so much a want of money as the want of sufficient staff. Another reason was that they had been devoting themselves with great diligence to the restoration of evicted tenants. He did not quarrel with that, except that it had been overdone. The hon. Member for East Mayo in 1903 said there were only about 800 families of evicted tenants, and he thought about 400 of those cases had been already disposed of. He believed that to-day there were over 5,000 or 6,000 applications from evicted tenants pending before the Commissioners, and the Estates Commissioners had in reality turned themselves into a manufactory of evicted tenants. The thing had become an intolerable abuse. The introduction of this Bill was to be attributed to the very unhappy and mischievous speech which the Chief Secretary made in reference to the Marquis of Clanricarde.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): Not at all.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL said that when the right hon. Gentleman referred in a jaunty and flippant way to the expropriation of landlords he was afraid he did not realise how dangerous it was to trifle in that way with landlords in Ireland. He opposed the Bill on the substantial ground that it was a distinct violation and rupture of the treaty supposed to have been arrived at on the question between all parties in 1903.

MR. BIRRELL said he had no objection whatever to being lectured by the right hon. Gentleman, but if he might make a suggestion to him he would beg of him not to apply to his most serious observations, made with the full sense of responsibility, the expressions jaunty and light-hearted, of which he was beginning to get a little tired. He spoke perfectly seriously, and he did not think that those terms should be applied. Neither did he ever suggest the expropriation of Lord Clanricade, or that he should be deprived of the emoluments he obtained from his estate. All that he suggested—and the suggestion had been made by men of greater weight than himself—was that sometimes in the history of a country they might come across landlords whose property might very well be vested in the hands of a committee, who would exercise all the rights of ownership in a way more consonant with the general feeling of the country than Lord Clanricarde had hitherto exhibited. That was not expropriation.

MR. JAMES CAMPBELL: It is very like it.

MR. BIRRELL: Not at all. If the right hon. Gentleman mismanaged an estate which brought him in £16,000 a year, and he (Mr. Birrell) took it and brought in £17,000 a year, what wrong did he suffer? On the contrary, it was very much better to substitute a sensible man than to retain a foolish one. It was with very much trepidation that for the first time in his life he plunged into the jungle of the Irish Land Law. When he had to cross the dangerous bogs of the finance of the Act of 1903 he wished his lot were cast in pleasanter places. He thought anybody looking at this particular measure would agree that the three principal provisions in it were those relating to the zones, to the extension of the principle of compulsory purchase, and to the bonus. Upon those points he did certainly protest very strongly against the notion that it was not open to any member of that House to introduce measures to amend the Act of 1903. It had been apparent for some time, and he ventured to say there was not a single intelligent man in Ireland or elsewhere conversant with the working of the Act who was not thoroughly convinced that it did need, and would benefit by, some amendment. Certainly the gentlemen representing the great body of Irish opinion and the tenants of Ireland, who were intended to be benefited by that Act, were at liberty to attempt its amendment, and any Government to whom they presented the measure was bound to consider whether or not it contained suggestions which ought to be thoroughly investigated. He was not in Parliament when the Act was passed, but he was bound to say that, if he had been in Parliament he would have known nothing more about the zones than the present occupants of the smoking-room. There was no Imperial law which required people to take an interest in any question which did not concern them, and he had never heard of a measure of the importance of this Act which had received so little notice either from the public or from the ordinary Members of the House. He confessed that until he became Chief Secretary he did not know what zones were. It was a fantastic term not found in the Act of Parliament; only in the rubric. Nobody would, however, deny that the object of zones was, in the first instance, to create areas of free bargain between the landlord and tenant, in which the Treasury was left out of account; and inspection of the property was not required to ascertain the goodness of the security and the equitableness of the bargain, unless the tenant could show that he was under duress. An arrangement of that kind in a matter which involved the whole value of the land of Ireland—a great deal more than £100,000,000—showed that the complaisance of the Treasury in those days was at a very high-water mark. He did not think anyone would deny that the zones system had increased the price which the landlord had obtained. It had tended to fix the price at an amount equal to twenty-four and a half years purchase. That was a greater number of years purchase than was contemplated by the landlords themselves. He did not blame anybody; it was one of the results which had followed from establishing this arbitrary system of zones. He thought, therefore, they might well review the question of zones; that they required some modification. With regard to compulsion, he had pledged himself to apply to that House during this session it might be for the necessary powers to enable him to restore evicted tenants. He was still enthusiastic enough to believe that it was a noble work to attempt to restore evicted tenants to their holdings. It was not the case that where they had an evicted tenant they immediately got a holding. The investigations that were going on had resulted in the exclusion of a large number of persons who had made this claim. The object of the Government was that the evicted tenants, be their number great or small, after investigation, should be restored either to their original holding or to some other land. If for that purpose compulsory powers were necessary, they would be applied for, and they would, he did not doubt, be granted by that House. The general question of compulsion all round brought him to the question of the finance of the Act, and he spoke, subject to the Treasury, with some natural anxiety on the subject. He did not think he would be doing his duty if he did not call attention to the present grave position of the financial obligations of the country. Under the provisions of the Acts the cost of flotation was thrown, in the first instance, upon the Irish development grant, and, secondly, upon the guarantee fund. The Act of 1903 gave the landlords cash instead of stock, and enlarged the number of years which the tenants had for repayment from forty-eight to sixty-eight and a half. The result, he thought, was that when they went to the market to obtain the money necessary to supply the wants of the landlords and the tenants they had to submit to a loss of something like 12 per cent., which on £1,000,000 spread over sixty-eight and a half years amounted to a very considerable sum. They had thrown upon the Irish development grant a loss of £70,000 a year. It was quite certain that by the time they had obtained £10,000,000 or £15,000,000 of money, in order to carry out this system, the Irish development grant would be bankrupt and exhausted. That being gone, they would have to fall back on the guarantee fund, and in a very short time the loss on the flotation of loans necessary to carry out land purchase would have to be borne by the ratepayers of Ireland. Then there was the other loss, not by flotation but by certain banking operations, amounting in two years to £72,000. A man who bought on the 1st March obtained on the 1st July the whole of the percentage from the previous January. That was one of the transactions which had contributed to this loss. The other two might be described as banking losses occasioned by the dealings between the National Debt Commissioners and the Treasury. But they found they would continue. There was no reason to suppose they would stop, and those also had to be borne by the county council rates. The whole scheme of land purchase under the Act of 1903 would most certainly be endangered if the ratepayers of Ireland found that they had to pay heavy contributions. That was a matter that would have to be gone into. He mentioned that because it lay at the bottom of the whole case of general compulsory powers. He was afraid they could serve no useful purpose by obtaining compulsory powers to buy up the whole of the land of Ireland when they had not got the means—the present machinery having broken down—of obtaining the necessary funds. He could not contemplate a proposal which would increase the demand for advances from £10,000,000 to £40,000,000, right up to the £160,000,000 that would be required, until they had reviewed the whole question of the finance of the Act of 1903. He did not wish to speak in any alarmist spirit, or to disturb the equanimity of the people in Ireland, but they were face to face with a great and grievous financial difficulty in this matter, and it would be absurd, rash, and improper on his part to hold out any hope of his being able, by any proposals such as those contained in this Bill, to increase the area of this work. Compulsion, no doubt, would have to come. The Act acknowledged that it must come, and the Government had acknowledged that it must come in the case of evicted tenants. If the Congested Districts Commission recommended compulsion, the Government would accept the recommendations of that Commission if they commended themselves to their minds.

All that they could do; but he was afraid that was all they could do at present. The Government were willing to agree to the Second Reading of this Bill because they found many parts of it capable of approval. Many of its clauses they were perfectly ready to adopt, and they were quite prepared to consider the Bill in a proper spirit. When they would be able to deal with the matter themselves he was unable to say; but, in his opinion, Parliament would fail in its responsibility if it did not express its intention of dealing at an early date with the whole question.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said there was a reply to the two main parts of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. The first was his contention that his Party was at liberty to make the alteration contemplated by this Bill, and the second was his reference to the question of finance. The Act of 1903 was not hastily arrived at. They worked at it for over two years before it was presented to the House. The Act had naturally failed in certain directions, but if they accepted this proposal for remedying that failure, they would run themselves into a greater difficulty which the Act had been drawn to avoid. He would almost lay it down that they could not revert from the cash basis of the Irish Land Act. He thought all that had happened since the Act was passed proved that the late Government were right.

And, it being Five of the clock, Mr. SPEAKER proceeded to interrupt the Business.

Whereupon Mr. JOHN REDMOND rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes, 209; Noes, 62. (Division List No. 136.)

Licence granted by his Majesty to Thomas Thompson under the provisions of the Penal Servitude Acts, 1853–1891, to which are annexed conditions other than those contained in Schedule A. of the Penal Servitude Act, 1864.

SHOP HOURS ACT, 1904 (COUNTY OF GLAMORGAN).

Order made by the council of the county of Glamorgan, and confirmed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department, fixing the hours of closing for certain classes of shops within the Aber Town and Ystrad Mynach wards of the Caerphilly Urban District.

Laid before the House (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the Table.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I beg to ask the noble Lord who represents the Foreign Office whether he is able to give the House any information as to the names of the delegates who will represent this country at the Hague Conference.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Lord FITZMAURICE): The British Plenipotentiaries to the Conference will be the right hon. Sir Edward Fry, the right hon. Sir Ernest Satow, the right hon. Lord Reay, late President of the Institute of International Law, and Sir Henry Howard, His Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at The Hague. In addition naval and military expert delegates will be appointed, whose names will be announced in due course.

THE APPOINTMENT OF MAGISTRATES.

*THE MARQUESS OF BATH rose to call attention to a memorial presented to the Lord Chancellor in December last year with reference to the appointment of Justices of the Peace, and to the reply of the Lord Chancellor thereto. The noble Marquess said: My Lords, I trust that no apology is necessary to your Lordships for drawing your attention to a subject of such importance as that which stands upon the Paper in my name. I desire to elicit the opinion of noble Lords, if I can, on the pressure which it is sought to employ, and which, in fact, is being employed in certain quarters, to compel Lords-Lieutenant to base, or, at all events, to colour, their recommendations for the office of county magistrate on political grounds, and, further, on the effort which is being made to transfer that pressure with the same object to the Lord Chancellor in the case of the Lord-Lieutenant declining to base his recommendations as desired. That is a matter which strikes at the root of the administration of justice, and it is for that reason that I venture to describe it as important and grave and as well worthy of the consideration of your Lordships' House which numbers so many Lords-Lieutenant among its members.

May I make two preliminary observations? Perhaps it may have occurred to some of your Lordships that it is presumptuous on the part of one who has occupied the office I have the honour to hold for so short a period to draw the attention of the House to this subject. I can only plead that it is precisely those who have the least experience who are most in need of guidance. The pressure to which I have referred has been greatly accentuated since the enactment of the measure of last year which abolished the property qualification for county magistrates. I make no complaint of that measure. I think I can confidently claim that I have honestly and frankly carried out its spirit and its intention. The second observation I desire to make is this. I wish to assure the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that I am bringing this subject forward in no partisan spirit, and, least of all, with any antagonistic feeling towards himself. I go further and say that I should be the last person who would desire in the least to embarrass him in the very difficult position he occupies. It would be impertinent if I were to attempt to praise the noble and learned Lord in his conduct of his office. But it would be equally ungracious and ungrateful if I were to fail at once to acknowledge the personal courtesy, the strict impartiality, and, may I venture to go further and say, the extraordinary industry and care which the noble and learned Lord has invariably displayed on every occasion on which I have had to consult him—and I believe that is the experience of others—with regard to appointments to the Commission of the Peace in the county, of which I have the honour to be His Majesty's Lord-lieutenant.

It is a matter of common knowledge that for the last fifteen years an agitation has been on foot to alter the system under which Lords-Lieutenant appoint county magistrates and to substitute their appointment by the Lord Chancellor direct without the intervention of Lords-Lieutenant. This agitation has been confined to one political party, and those who have taken part in it have suggested without hesitation that in making his appointments the Liberal Lord Chancellor should seek his sources of information from the Liberal Members of the House of Commons. This agitation took a concrete form in 1893, and I shall have to refer to what occurred then. But its latest and most active eruption took place in December last, when the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was the victim of a torrent of lava. The noble and learned Lord survived the shock, and, although he was threatened with a further display of volcanic violence, he seems, publicly at all events, not to have suffered.

I have no means myself of knowing whether the noble and learned Lord has been warned, by rumblings of a local and scattered character, of the imminence of another eruption, but I myself and others have had indications, which cannot be mistaken, that this volcanic activity is by no means set at rest. In December last a memorial was presented to the noble and learned Lord which complained of the partiality of the Lords-Lieutenant, which desired, as it was expressed, to put the system on a non political basis, and which alleged that the vast disparity between Conservative and Liberal Justices had grown up during the long domination of the Conservative Party. The memorialists then proceeded to explain how the system could be rectified, and they invited the noble and learned Lord to discuss the matter with them. The Lord Chancellor did not consider that much good would come of an interview, and I desire to draw your Lordships' attention to the opening sentence of his courteous and instructive reply. He said—

> "The memorial signed by eighty-eight Members of the House of Commons which you handed me begins by expressing an earnest desire that under some new system the appointment of Justices of the Peace should become non-political. All the remainder of the document takes for granted that the existing system must necessarily be one of appointment under 'political influences,' and in effect aims at making those influences more dominant and effective than hitherto while that system lasts. I agree in the initial aspiration, but cannot reconcile it with the remainder of the document."

That the recrudescence of this agitation is closely connected with the passing of the measure to which I have referred is shown by the language of the memorial. It states that—

> "The passing of the recent Act of Parliament removing the property qualification indicates a general agreement that the administration of justice should no longer be the prerogative of a single class, and that, particularly in view of the powers which should reside in the justices with regard to the drink trade, it is of the greatest importance to find, within reasonable time, improved means for making the county Benches more truly representative, both of political opinion and of the different social classes of the community."

I submit that it is clear from the language of the memorial, from a consideration of the history of the case, and from the pressure which is brought to bear on Lords-Lieutenant, that the aim of those who have combined to exert this pressure is not so much an improvement in the administration of justice, as a political colouring of the Bench, and the extension of political patronage.

For what purpose is it desired to give a political hue to the county Benches? I regret to have to do so, but I am bound to say—it has been forced on my mind by both observation and experience—that in some quarters, at any rate, there is a hope that the political views of intemperate partisans appointed on political grounds may colour the administration of justice in various quarters and in a variety of ways. This movement, I think it will be acknowledged, is manifestly organised. Many of the recommendations that have been sent forward have not been confined to individual cases, but have been in squadrons and platoons. It is a remarkable fact that it is only since the last general election that these lengthy lists of nominations have been forwarded to Lords-Lieutenant, and in those nominations not a line, not a word, is put in to show that the petty sessional divisions which will be affected by them are in want of additional magistrates.

The political views of the nominees invariably coincide with the political opinions of the nominator, and in some cases I have found, after careful inquiry, that on grounds of physical incapacity, and even on personal grounds, some of these nominations are unreliable, and are, I suggest, therefore reckless and ill-considered. I have even been requested, in some cases almost peremptorily, to recommend persons for addition to the Commission of the Peace whom I could not honestly have justified myself in recommending had they been Conservatives or Unionists. I frankly state that I do not consider myself a mere conduit pipe to convey messages—I cannot call them recommendations—to the Lord Chancellor. I consider that I have a duty and a responsibility in satisfying myself as to the fitness and capacity of those whom I recommend to the noble and learned Lord. I recognise that in the last resort the responsibility lies with him to accept or reject the reasons which I may have placed before him for declining to forward any particular name or names, but I say that I have a duty to satisfy myself and to be able to guarantee the personal fitness of those whom I submit for his approval and assent.

The Marquess of Bath.

The plan of campaign is transparent. The Lords-Lieutenant are to be requested to forward lists of names to the noble and learned Lord, and if they decline to do so, they are to be denounced as partisans, and the Lord Chancellor is then to make his appointments over the heads of the Lords-Lieutenant and without any information to guide him. I ask your Lordships to consider what this means. In these days it not infrequently happens that the representative of a county division has no local connection with the constituency which he represents, and even in some cases has no residence in the county whose Benches he proposes to people and to control. When it is suggested that the Lords-Lieutenant are too much in the hands of the local Benches whom they consult, what must be the case with the nominations of those gentlemen who of necessity are entirely dependent on their political supporters and on political agents and wire-pullers for their sources of information?

The suggestions of partisanship on the part of Lords-Lieutenant, and that the political opinion of the magistrates prevents them from doing justice in the administration of the law, were repudiated both by the late Lord Herschell in this House and by Mr. Asquith in the House of Commons. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has himself rejected the first insinuation in terms as gratifying as they are generous. The Lord Chancellor said—

> "It is bare justice I should say that, with rare exceptions, the Lords-Lieutenant with whom I have been in communication have acted and advised impartially and have taken much pains."

And again—

> "Without their help it would be impracticable to transact the business, and they have often warned against and so prevented most undesirable appointments."

I succeeded in the office which I have the honour to hold an eminent and a deservedly respected Member of your Lordships' House—the late Lord Cork. He was a keen Party man and was a Peer who followed Mr. Gladstone in his Irish policy. He was Lord-Lieutenant of Somerset for forty years, and it was stated in 1893 that the proportion of Liberal justices in that county was 20 per cent. I think the proportion now, of those I have nominated, is 34 per cent.

But, my Lords, is it suggested for a moment, to take one or two illustrations, that the late Lord Cork, or, may I say, the noble Marquess the respected Leader of this House, who was His Majesty's Lord-Lieutenant for the North Riding of Yorkshire for thirty-three years, and, I believe, succeeded a Liberal Peer who was appointed in 1838—is it suggested that those noble Lords have deliberately refrained from appointing to the Bench gentlemen of their own political views? I am perfectly certain that they acted with the greatest impartiality, that they based their recommendations on personal fitness irrespective of political opinions, and that they did not pass over their political friends because they were afraid of outside criticism. I am certain that no unworthy and no ulterior motives prompted their action, and the fact that the political complexion of the county Benches is largely of one hue is due to the accident of conditions and not to the design of responsible authorities. The suggestion that the vast disparity in the numbers of Conservative and Liberal justices is due to the long domination of the Conservative Party is proved, after impartial investigation and a study of the facts, to be without foundation.

There is another element to be considered besides merely the personal fitness of those recommended—namely, the requirements of the locality. I cannot help feeling that that consideration has been totally ignored by those who have bombarded us with their applications. After careful inquiry I find, so far as my own county is concerned, that most of the petty sessional benches are full, that some of them are even over-manned, and it is no exaggeration to say that if I were to succumb to all the demands made upon me room would have to be found for the overflow of magistrates, I presume, in the dock, and then we should have a demand made for further accommodation for the evicted tenants of that undesirable holding. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, I am glad to say, has not lost sight of that point, and he informed his correspondents that he was not prepared to flood the Benches, and that if he were to accede to all their demands there would be a regular deluge.

May I briefly refer to what occurred in 1893, because history only repeats itself? There was a deputation to the Lord Chancellor of the day, the late Lord Herschell, and then, as now, there was the complaint as to the partiality of Lords-Lieutenant, and even as to the partiality of the magistrates; there was complaint as to the undue proportion of political opinion on the Benches, and then, as now, the suggestion was made that the Lord Chancellor should appoint without the intervention of the Lords-Lieutenant. Lord Herchell, I think rather rashly, as he afterwards found, invited an expression of opinion from the then House of Commons to justify him in departing from immemorial practice, and a Resolution was passed. But I should be doing an injustice to the memory of that distinguished Member of this House if I did not draw your Lordships' attention to a part of his reply to the deputation. He said—

> "It would not do to take merely the recommendations of the representatives or the chairman of the Liberal association who sends the name to you, because it is not always necessarily those who are the most active politicians who would be the best for the magisterial bench."

In the month of June a Resolution was moved in this House by the Duke of Richmond to the following effect—

> "That it has been a long-established custom that the Justices of the Peace should be appoined in counties on the recommendation of the Lords-Lieutenant; and that in the opinion of this House it is highly inexpedient to disturb this usage in any county for the purpose of placing on the Bench justices whose political opinions are in consonnance with those of the Government of the day."

Lord Herschell took part in that debate, and the Resolution was carried nemine contradicente. I trust that the terms of that Resolution commend themselves as emphatically to your Lordships to-day. With accurate foresight the late Lord Selborne pointed to the probability of the pressure of which I submit the Lord Chancellor is now the subject. He said—

> "I venture to say that there was no more difficult or unsatisfactory part of the duty of the Lord Chancellor in my time than that which related to the appointment of borough magistrates. There was constant pressure to obtain appointments for every reason except the fitness of the persons recommended for the performance of judicial duties, and most especially for political reasons. One manifest evil is the constant tendency to an undue increase in the number of magistrates. I am thoroughly convinced that there will be pressure brought to bear which the Lord Chancellor will find it most difficult, if not impossible, to resist, on party grounds, for making appointments which are not necessary to be made for the proper administration of justice, and which, when made, will not be conducive to the administration of justice."

Lord (then Mr.) Courtney, whom we welcome to this House, also expressed the same apprehension when he referred to—

> "An unconscious confession that in the minds of some there lurked the feeling that magistrates should be appointed, not on the grounds of personal fitness, but as the reward of political support. He was sure that the present Lord Chancellor, and he believed all Lords Chancellors, would beg protection against the pressure that would thus be put upon them."

The noble Duke (the Duke of Devonshire) referring in the same debate to his experience as a Lancashire representative, stated that pressure had been frequently brought to bear upon him to make appointments based solely and avowedly on political grounds, and simply as a reward for political services. Lord Herschell, in this debate—and it shows that he had considerably modified his views since he made his suggestion in March—said—

> "I admit at once that the transfer from the Lord-Lieutenant to the Lord Chancellor of the entire responsibility of manning the Bench would not be satisfactory. I am aware that the difficulty of the Lord-Lieutenant in a particular county is great in ascertaining whether the names presented are those of fit persons or not, but the difficulty of the Lord Chancellor in dealing with all the counties of England, Scotland, and Wales is infinitely greater. If, however, he has the assistance of those who know the county thoroughly in such a matter, there would be less liability of making mistakes. The Lord Chancellor would be perfectly mad if he relied entirely on wire-pullers and political agents. If I were to man the Bench solely on the recommendation of the politicians in counties I should make blunder after blunder."

Now, when the suggestion is made that there is dissatisfaction with the composition of the county magistracy, I ask, where is the evidence of any dissatisfaction and discontent with the administration of justice ? I am almost inclined to think that disappointed ambition and the consequent discontent of some local politicians have been magnified into conclusive evidence of the existence of discontent with the administration of justice.

But, my Lords, if there were any real, any widespread, any deep-seated or well-grounded dissatisfaction with the administration of justice, I submit that it would be found in the popular voice in the elections to local councils and boards, and not merely in the rumblings and grumblings of disappointed politicians. It is because I believe this agitation to be artificial and unreal that I have drawn the attention of the House to it this evening, and I venture to assert that to Americanise our system of administering justice by treating appointments to the magistracy as the legitimate spoil of political victors would be the last and the worst form of dementia Americana. It would open the door to methods of retaliation to which we are at present happily strangers.

Recommendations are one thing, and they are certainly not to be discountenanced. Solicitation is another, and should not be encouraged. But dictation is a third, and it becomes intolerable if it is not stoutly resisted. The principle which I have endeavoured to place before the House this evening may be summed up in sentence. It is this—that appointments a to the county benches should be made because the localities require them and not because politicians desire them ; and, further, that in the appiontment of magistrates men should be selected for their personal capacity and character, and not merely for their party zeal or political services. If I have been able at all to carry your Lordships with me in the principle I have endeavoured to give utterance to, I, at all events, shall feel that the trespass I have ventured to make on your Lordships' time is not wholly unpardonable.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Loreburn): My Lords, probably it will be thought most convenient that I should address your Lordships immediately after the noble Marquess. Most of my colleagues will have to leave in a short time for the purpose of attending other important duties, and I therefore hope that if there should be anything said during the debate which I ought to answer, the House will be so indulgent as to allow me the favour of a few words at the conclusion.

I agree with the noble Marquess in one thing. I do not think that there is any foundation whatever for the idea, if such idea be current, that justice is not fairly administered in the main by the justices of the peace in this country. My belief is that they render a public service for which the country ought to be grateful to them; and in the whole of the time that I have been in my present place, although I have had complaints in regard to the vaccination laws, I have not received, and I believe that there has been really no ground for, any complaints in regard to the improper administration of justice by the magistrates of this country. It would be indeed a very ill thing on my part if I gave the slightest countenance to what I believe to be an unworthy aspersion.

Having said that, I pass to the main subject of the noble Marquess, and I think the simplest way is to begin by stating what it is that I want to see in regard to the bench of justices, and what is the policy in which my friends and colleagues, I believe, heartily concur. I attach the utmost importance to the office. Lord Bacon regarded the appointment of justices as being among the most important duties of the Lord Chancellor, and I think it is perfectly true. They have, in the first place, at the present day to administer the licensing laws—a matter of very great anxiety and difficulty; and, whether in their character of justices at petty sessions or at quarter sessions, or as grand jurymen, nearly all the criminal cases that there are in England and Wales come before them at one stage or another. And therefore I regard the office as one which ought not to be made a reward for political service, and as one which ought not to be distributed except because of the merit and claim of the person to be appointed. That is what I should like to see, and hope we may attain some day in this country.

I strongly object, of course, to anything like a monopoly of this office on the part of any Party in the State, or of any creed, or of those occupying any particular social status. It is a matter in which no one ought to look beyond the question, Is this person a person respected in his locality and likely to administer justice impartially, with knowledge, and with the sympathy of the population at large? Very well, I believe that will be the opinion of all of your Lordships, and I am bound to say that in the numerous communications that I have had with Lords-Lieutenant I have found that we do not really differ in our objects. I may add also that we have hardly ever differed in regard to the names of the justices who have been placed upon the Bench. The noble Marquess and myself have had more than one interview, and in the end I think we were agreed as to the names of those to be placed on the Bench. So it has been in regard to almost all the other Lords-Lieutenant with whom I have had the honour to communicate.

I wish to describe, simply and without offence, what we found was the case when we first came into office, and I think those who are acquainted with rural England will not dispute the truth of the description that I am going to give. For whatever reason—and I will say a word about the reason presently—there is no doubt that most of the magistrates in many of the counties of England belong to one political side. I am not attributing blame—I am going to speak of the cause presently; but that is a fact, and a fact that was admitted when we were discussing this subject last year. Also they were nearly all gentlemen of the same social status. They were not bad magistrates; they did their duty; but that was the description of their opinions and their social position.

Now, how did this come about? I do not in the least suggest, and I do not suppose that the noble Marquess thinks that I suggested, that this was done by any deliberate action or desire of the Lords-Lieutenant. I do not think so. On the contrary, I know that in many cases that I have discussed they have expressed a desire to find men of other than one particular creed and other than one particular class of opinion; but they stated (what I believe in many cases is perfectly true) that the difficulty is to find them, and that has undoubtedly been one factor. Also there was in existence, as we are aware, a law requiring a property qualification, which has been abolished. It is certainly the case that, by some freak of nature, those who are in better financial circumstances incline the more to the Conservative Party than they do unhappily to the Liberal Party, besides which there is this, the Lords-Lieutenant, of course, cannot know all the persons themselves individually, and they necessarily derive their information from other sources.

The Lord-Lieutenant himself is nearly always a person of great rank and distinction, and the petty rivalries and ambitions of his neighbourhood seem to him to be a fragment of the infinitely little. But it is not so among people of humbler degree who live in the locality and advise him. And I think the noble Marquess will admit this much, that the constant influence and the constant prepossession of the local Benches and their chairmen, and those others who have been in the habit of advising Lords-Lieutenant, has beyond doubt been unfavourable to one particular Party in the country, and has been biassed in favour of persons of a particular social status. I am not imputing malevolence. These things are all perfectly natural. It is not at all unnatural that those who have to choose, or to recommend, men who are to sit with them on the Bench should prefer people who move in the same circle, whom they know personally, whom they meet in the hunting field, the cricket field, or wherever else they seek their recreation. These things are not unnatural; but I say these influences have been permanent, and, although operating in a small way and in a small circle in each county, they have had a very great influence in producing the result which I have described.

I do not believe that it is the desire either of this House or of any other responsible body of men that there should be a sense of exclusion on the part of any of our countrymen, or that men should feel that the ways of honour and of distinction are closed to them in the neighbourhood where they live and like to be well regarded. It is not fair play, and it is not policy for this reason—that you ought to have, not merely the fact that justice is well administered in a district, but the general confidence of the community in the administration of justice, and a feeling that they or any of their class may, if they are worthy, be placed there to take part in administering justice.

There is no doubt at all that a very strong feeling has arisen and been existing for some time in reference to this subject. The noble Marquess thinks it is rather fictitious. I do not deny that there are fictitious elements in almost every agitation in this country upon every side in public life. We are all too familiar with the fictitious side of these things. But there is a genuine and a real side as well as a fictitious side; and I can assure the noble Marquess that if he had access—and for that matter he is heartily welcome to it—to the communications that come to me from different parts he would not think that it was merely the local wirepullers or the person fired with the ambition of being made a magistrate—a very curious ambition, I must say it often appears to me, for it is a most laborious duty if properly discharged—he would not think this feeling was confined to so narrow and so unworthy an element as that. There is, I can assure him, and there has been for some time a very real feeling that men who otherwise would be placed upon the Bench have been prevented from being so placed because of the partiality shown to Conservatives and to others in a particular social status. That is true. It may be exaggerated, if you will, but there is a very real and true feeling to that effect; and I certainly have had, and Lords-Lieutenant have remedied on my representation, repeated instances of men of very high standing who have been unaccountably passed over, not by the fault of the Lord-Lieutenant, as I have learned whenever I have made representation to him, but by reason of the influences and bias to which I have referred.

I admit in the fullest manner that there is another side to it. The noble Marquess has referred to a communication that I had to make to Members of the House of Commons last December. I stand by every word that I said, and I shall not be shaken, under any circumstances. But may I remind him of this? I said then—and it is perfectly true—that the great bulk of the communications that have been made to me by Members of Parliament have been of names, carefully prepared and thought over, honourably put forward by men who have as much repugnance as he or I have to the prostitution of the Bench of justices for any base purpose, but put forward really and truly because those who did not themselves want to be magistrates, but did wish to see fair play, felt that in their own locality something ought to be done to redress what was amiss. I must certainly say that I think the great bulk of those recommendations that have been made to me have been made in that spirit. I will not say that everyone knows, but I think it is the case that, whenever a new Government comes in, I do not care which side it is, there is apt to be an ugly rush for the purpose of getting some sort of political reward in the form of appointments to the Bench of justices. I do not want to say much about that, except that, if it has been complied with by some Chancellors, it will not be by me.

I have this feeling, that whatever may be said about the distribution of decorations, or titles, or other marks and badges of honour, under no circumstances ought any position of trust, as the position of a justice is, to be given to any person who is not quite fit for it in the opinion of those most competent to judge. Under these circumstances what have I done, what has the course been that I have adopted? What I have done in each case is, when any complaint or any representation was made in regard to the political complexion of the Bench that any persons were being excluded or had been excluded because of their opinions, or not equally treated, I have always forwarded anything that has been said to the Lords-Lieutenant, whenever I thought it was worthy of attention. There are many names and cases which I have not forwarded at all, because I did not think them to be worthy of attention.

I have no doubt the noble Marquess is perfectly right—in fact, I am sorry to say, from my own knowledge, that it is true—that some names sent forward in that way have not been the names of suitable persons. I am sure everyone will feel that it is impossible for me to be responsible for that being the case; but I can say that I have really tried to know, before sending these names forward, whether they were fit and worthy names. I have taken a good deal of pains to do that, and, when I have done so, I have met the Lords-Lieutenant. Our interviews have neither been long nor stormy. They have been, I think, always of a very pleasant character, and, with hardly any exception at all, the names that have been placed on the list have been placed with the concurrence of the Lords-Lieutenant. That has been the case with the noble Marquess, when certain names were placed on the list with the approval of the noble Marquess himself. So it is in the case of others. If, for example, a class of persons like workmen have not been placed on the Bench, or it was a case of the representatives of Roman Catholics not being admitted to the Bench, I have done exactly the same. I have communicated with the Lords-Lieutenant, and any remedy that has been applied has been applied with their approval, I believe almost without exception.

For my part, may I say that I think it is not a question of appointing simply on political considerations? I think you ought to get the best men, and see that no one is excluded either by reason of his political or religious opinions or by reason of his status; and I am glad to say that many working men, who have had the highest record, have been placed on different Benches in this country during the time I have had the honour of being Chancellor. That is what has been done; and now, having said that, I want to indicate, in one sense, concurrence with something that has been said by the noble Marquess.

I am not fully satisfied with the present working of the system of appointing magistrates. I have pointed out that a certain stream of information came to the Lords-Lieutenant, and that I thought that stream was charged with prepossession to a certain extent and with bias. A stream of information comes, also, to me, which is equally charged with prepossession and with bias. I do not think that that is a satisfactory condition of things on either side. I do not think it is desirable that a Lord-Lieutenant, with his great responsibility, should be dependent upon sources which are in any degree prejudiced, nor do I think it is desirable that I should be dependent upon such sources. I have thought a good deal as to whether it would be possible to make any suggestion by which, not during the tenure of office of one Government or of another, but permanently, some machinery should be set up by which we could get simply and solely the best men without hearing of the political side or the social side, by which an unbiassed choice should be made of the very best men for the purpose without the slighest regard to their opinions on any subject.

I have found it a matter of extreme difficulty to think out any such project. The other day I was sent a letter by a friend of mine written in the year 1745, from which it appeared that the great Lord Hardwicke, who was then Chancellor, had asked the Members for Norfolk their advice with regard to the appointment of magistrates, and they went to the assizes and consulted the grand jury as to what names they should send up to the Lord Chancellor in compliance with that request. I do not know whether the grand jury might be invoked, or whether, what would perhaps be more suitable, the county council might be asked to assist. I think it is most desirable that the ultimate responsibility should remain where it is, with the Lord Chancellor and the Lords-Lieutenant. and that they should themselves act cordially together in trying to get the best men under considerable difficulties. But I do not know whether it is possible. As I say, I really have not made up my mind, I cannot make up my mind definitely, on the subject of whether it is possible that a committee should be selected in each county, a committee of perfectly impartial men, with full local knowledge, who should be consulted in respect of all appointments that were to be made. Whether that is practicable or not, I really do not know; perhaps in the course of the debate some other plan may be suggested. If that course cannot be adopted, I can see nothing for it but to go on in the way in which we are going on now, and I hope that if we do we shall escape undue censure on any hand.

One other alteration which I should like to see, if possible, was referred to by the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition last year. The noble Marquess asked whether anything could be done for the purpose of preventing gentlemen from continuing to hold the office of justice of the peace without discharging any of its duties. There is not the least doubt that a number of justices are merely nominal justices, and that they have no excuse for not discharging their duties. There are many of us in this House who, though we happen to be justices, have something else to do, and may well be excused, or at least hope for consideration, but if a man has nothing else to do, or has plenty of leisure, and systematically neglects to attend on the Bench, I think that I and the Lords-Lieutenant between us might arrange some method of asking such a person whether, in the interests of the county, he should not make place for someone who would discharge the duties. I agree with the noble Marquess that it would be most wrong to overman the Bench, and I have no intention of doing anything of the kind. But it is a different thing that gentlemen should remain justices or accept office when they have no intention of discharging the duties. I have stated what I have tried to do, and the spirit and object with which I have tried to do it; and I have also suggested the different amendments which do not require legislation, but which might be arranged between the Lords-Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor. I hope this debate will be fruitful in suggestions by which these difficulties may be overcome.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, the House is indebted to my noble friend for having been the means of inducing the noble and learned Lord to make the important statement to which we have just listened. It is a statement which I for one, and I think many of your Lordships must have listened to with the utmost satisfaction. That speech, following as it does the statement made by the noble and learned Lord last year, and following the remarkable letter published not long ago in The Times newspaper by the noble and learned Lord, seems to me to dispose once and for all of all the statements which have been freely made—statements in my belief entirely unfounded and unjustified—that these appointments to the Bench have in the past been usually given as the reward of political service; and it disposes also of the still more mischievous suggestion that, in order to redress the balance, future appointments should be made on the same grounds.

I gather from the noble and learned Lord's statement that he, at any rate, is satisfied that the manner in which the county magistrates of this country have administered justice has been satisfactory and beyond suspicion. I gather that he is determined that, for the future, appointments to the Bench will be made solely with reference to the merit and fitness of the individual concerned; that he is entirely opposed to the idea of flooding the county Benches with new magistrates in order to redress the disparity which now exists between the numbers in which the two political Parties are represented; and that, on the other hand, it is his desire that no person fit for one of these appointments should have the feeling that he is excluded on account of the particular political or religious tenets which he happens to observe. If that correctly represents the creed of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, I take leave to say that that is my creed also, and I believe the creed of every reasonable man in the country.

When I speak of selecting magistrates with reference to their fitness for a seat on the Bench, I ask myself what is it that we mean when we speak of a person being fit for magisterial work. In the first place, we intend that he shall be a person possessing, if I may use the words of the noble Lord in charge of last year's Bill, "education and intelligence." I do not suggest that a knowledge of the dead languages or anything of that kind is indispensable; but I do mean that a person should have that kind of education which, at any rate, will enable him to sift evidence in a reasonable manner, and to distinguish between statements based upon mere assertion and matters of proved fact.

What is the next qualification upon which we should insist? It is that the individual should occupy a position of independence. I do not mean independence in the sense of social rank or connection, but a position which places him beyond the reach or beyond the suspicion of improper influence. And that is the view of His Majesty's Government, because the House will remember that in the Act of last year there was a clause which made it illegal for a solicitor to sit upon the Bench before which he is in the habit of practising.

I think it is impossible to deny that in the past persons possessing qualifications of this kind have been more numerous and easier to find in the ranks of the Party represented on this side of the House than on the other side. That is a consequence which is inherent in the circumstances of the case; and in the past appointments to the Bench have been made, not because the individual has been a member of a particular Party, but because the particular attributes for which the Lords-Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor had to look have been more usually found among persons possessing that territorial qualification of which we got rid last year. It was for that reason that I for one was ready to welcome the legislation of last year, because it seemed to me to extend the area within which the Lord-Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor could look for suitable magistrates, and thereby break down what was, in appearance at any rate, the monopoly of one political Party.

I regret as much as the noble and learned Lord regrets that in the result it should prove to be the case that so enormous a preponderance of magistrates in some counties should be drawn from one political Party rather than the other. That is a political misfortune; but it would be a still greater misfortune if, in order to redress the disparity, incompetent persons were appointed recklessly and in a wholesale manner. But the declaration of the noble and learned Lord on that point appears to me entirely satisfactory, and I have not a word to say against it. I may say that the doctrine of the noble and learned Lord seemed to me more satisfactory than that propounded a few days ago by the Prime Minister in another place. The Prime Minister made a statement which, to those who read it, appeared to suggest that magistrates might be appointed as a reward, I will do him the justice to say, not of political service, but of local service, and with the object of redressing the inequality of which I spoke a moment ago.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am sure the noble Marquess will understand that I should be the last man in England to say anything inconsistent with the declarations of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I am sure that if the noble Marquess reads the Prime Minister's statement carefully he will find that there was nothing inconsistent with what I have said.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: There may not have been a difference in intention, but there certainly is a difference in the manner in which the case was put. The Prime Minister used these words—

> "We are engaged in redressing the inequality of the present position of things."

My point is that that is not the object, or, at any rate, the main object, with which appointments should be made to the Bench; but that they should be made solely with regard to other considerations—first, whether the Bench stands in need of additional magistrates; and, secondly, whether the person put forward is in all respects a competent person. But I do not believe that, so far as the Lords-Lieutenants are concerned, there will be found to be any difference of opinion with regard to the principles on which we ought to proceed; and I for one should look forward, so long as these principles are observed, to there being not only no friction, but very loyal and useful co-operation between the Lords-Lieutenant and the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack in the selection of magistrates. Whether it is possible that the machinery of selection can be permanently improved on the lines suggested by the noble and learned Lord, I do not like to say at this moment. I understood him to hint at the possibility of establishing a committee of what he described as perfectly impartial men to whom might be entrusted the duty of selecting these gentleman.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Advising.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am afraid there might be some initial difficulty in satisfying everybody of the strict impartiality of every one placed on that distinguished body. With regard to the other proposal, which I think the noble and learned Lord attributed to me, but the credit of which I cannot help thinking is due to my noble friend Lord St. Aldwyn—that a magistrate who habitually shirks his work and absents himself from the Bench should by some means or other be relieved of his duties—that seems to me an admirable suggestion, and if the noble and learned Lord carries the matter further, I believe he will receive a great deal of support.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.

Read 3ª (according to order), and passed.

CARNEGIE INSTITUTE.

LORD LEITH OF FYVIE rose to move for any correspondence which had taken place between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and His Majesty's Ambassador to the United States of America respecting the international celebrations held at Pittsburg, United States of America, in connection with the opening of the Carnegie Institute; and to ask why His Majesty's Ambassador was not present or represented on that international occasion.

The noble Lord said: My Lords, the Question I have placed upon the Paper requires an answer in some form, and I have no doubt it will be one which will remove the feeling that there has been indifference on the part of our Ambassador in America to affairs going on there. The institute to which I refer, the Carnegie Institute, has been growing for many years and is regarded by the people of the United States as a national institution. It is really the expression of an enormous evolution and development in the arts of iron and steel, especially in that centre of industry, Pittsburg, and therefore invitations were sent by the Committee to all nations to take part in the celebration of inauguration. Our Ambassador at Washington was invited, together with the representatives of all other foreign nations. His Majesty the Emperor William was not only represented by his Ambassador but he specially requested that a Commission, representing him, of the highest arts and sciences of his country, should be allowed to visit Pittsburg at the time and take part in the inauguration.

France, Italy, and other countries as well were represented by their highest minds in science and art, but in this international gathering England apparently was not represented. Our Ambassador declined the invitation, stating inability to attend, and he also declined on the part of the members of the Embassy to allow them to attend a meeting at which the representatives of all nations were taking part in doing honour to a very great evolution—a world evolution. England alone stood aloof in the inauguration of this institute. Those who have worked in the United States and in connection with the people of America are aware how sensitive they are, and how often it is that little things of this kind affect the public mind and grow from an acorn into an enormous tree of public opinion.

It will be a great disappointment to those who have been connected with the United States if they see that the great work done by the patient endeavours of the late Lord Pauncefote in establishing the entente between the two countries is in any way endangered by an act of indifference which might be construed into something rather stronger; and I think it is desirable that the matter should be met at once and the American people told that there was no intention of any indifference. Our own people were represented largely by the Colonies and representatives of arts and letters, but when it came to the question of the Government, England was silent. Surely England should have taken the lead in a matter of this kind to congratulate the country on this great institution which constitutes an immense development of the technical and scientific education of the nation.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty for any correspondence which has taken place between the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and His Majesty's Ambassador to the United States of America respecting the international celebrations held at Pittsburg, United States of America, in connection with the opening of the Carnegie Institute.—(Lord Leith of Fyvie.)

LORD FITZMAURICE: My Lords, there is no correspondence which, in the opinion of the Foreign Office, could be usefully laid respecting the celebrations held at Pittsburg in connection with the opening of the Carnegie Institute. I hope, however, that I shall be able to give a reply which will be satisfactory to the noble Lord. I make no complaint of his asking the Question. On the contrary, statements have been made in the Press in regard to this gathering which, if uncontradicted, might possibly leave a mistaken impression. I therefore think it desirable that they should be contradicted, and I am grateful to the noble Lord for having given me this opportunity of doing so.

I wish, in the first place, to say that the invitations which were issued to the heads of foreign Missions, were not issued to them as such, or in any official capacity. I have been in communication with His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington since the noble Lord placed his Question on the Paper, and the statement I am making is based on information received from him. His Majesty's Ambassador had only just returned from an official visit to Canada, and had important business to transact at Washington, which made it impossible for him to absent himself again so soon, especially as he was due to attend the National Arbitration and Peace Congress Conference at New York and a conference at Philadelphia during the following week. It was, as I have said, impossible for Mr. Bryce to attend the opening of the Carnegie Institute owing to the multifarious character of the duties which awaited him immediately on his arrival at Washington from Canada, whither he had gone for high reasons of State, and he selected those engagements which he could attend with the greatest facility consistently with the discharge of his other duties at Washington. Neither the German, Austro-

Hungarian, French nor Russian Embassies were represented at Pittsburg; therefore there was nothing in the absence of Mr. Bryce to call attention in any marked way by contrast to any discrepancy between the position of the British Embassy and the Embassies I have mentioned. There were important representatives of those great interests, educational and other, to which the Pittsburg Institute so much appeals in the presence at the celebrations of delegates from our great and ancient Universities as well our more modern Universities, and I believe the Government of the United States and the people of America fully recognised in the presence of those deputations the outward sign of the respect and sympathy which the Government and people of this country felt in that great gathering and the proceedings connected with it. If there has been any misunderstanding such as the noble Lord seems to think has arisen, I am exceedingly glad of the opportunity publicly to state how much His Majesty's Government and our Ambassador at Washington appreciated the importance of that occasion, and how much Mr. Bryce himself regretted that he was prevented from attending; and I need not remind the House that there is hardly any man in the whole of our diplomatic service to whom a great educational occasion of this kind would appeal more than to Mr. Bryce.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

Alleged Dissatisfaction amongst Irish National School Inspectors.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the dissatisfaction amongst inspectors of national schools in Ireland, because they are constantly harassed by letters from the Education Office, to which many of them had to write strongly in reply, while others had to travel long distances from the country to Dublin to remonstrate in person against such treatment, and some are afraid to give expression to their feelings on the matter for fear of penalties involved; whether these letters are the productions of clerks and others utterly ignorant of inspection work; whether any of the twenty Commissioners, except Dr. Starkie, can be sufficiently intimate with the working of the Education Office to know anything about the justice of any fine or censure imposed; and whether, seeing complaints or protests only lead to further punishment which, owing to the ignorance of the inner working of the office on the part of nearly all the Commissioners, can be inflicted with impunity, he will appoint a small committee to inquire into the working of the National Education Office.

[The following Answer to be substituted for that printed in the Debates for Friday, 19th April, cols. 1260–1.]

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that they are not aware that dissatisfaction exists amongst their inspectors generally. Certain inspectors have been guilty of irregularities and have performed their duties in an unsatisfactory manner, and have consequently incurred official censure. This censure was not imposed until the cases had been very fully investigated by the chief or senior inspectors and the facts placed before the resident Commissioner or the Board. Two of the inspectors concerned were summoned before a special committee meeting of the Commissioners, and were afforded full opportunity of answering the charges brought against them. The Commissioners individually are kept fully informed of all the business of the office, and no serious punishment is inflicted on any officers without their authority. The maintenance of discipline among the staff is a matter which falls within the province of the Commissioners themselves, and no facts have been brought to my notice which would appear to call for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the matter.

Condition of Irish Land Purchase Guarantee Fund.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will state the present condition of the Guarantee Fund under the Irish Land Purchase Acts, showing the amount drawn to make good defaults under the Act of 1903, the amounts withheld from several counties and from the whole of Ireland out of the normal Probate Duty and agricultural grants, which must now be added to local rates; is the Treasury aware that in this way people, not parties to the purchase transactions, are contributing to the payment of prices; and can he find in the practice of the Treasury any precedent or analogy for the present system of land purchase.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The following Statement shows the net amounts drawn under the Land Purchase Act of 1903 from the Guarantee Fund for each county and the whole of Ireland, for the period from the commencement at 1st November, 1903, to 31st January, 1907:—

As regards the allocation of the sums so drawn between the Death Duty Grant and the Agricultural Grant, the hon. Member is referred to the Answer given by my right hon. friend the Chief Secretary on the 16th instant;[†] but I should point out that the figures given by him include sums drawn under previous Land Acts as well as under the Act of 1903. In the last part of the Question the hon. Member is criticising the policy of the Act of 1903 which the Treasury has no power to alter.

Liverpool Post Office Medical Officer.

MR. VIVIAN (Birkenhead): To ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the suggestion that the telegraph staff residing in the Birkenhead area of Liverpool are dissatisfied with their treatment by the local medical officer, and that in consequence a number have recourse to other medica officers; and whether he will cause inquiries to be made.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) No suggestion of the kind has reached me; but I will make inquiry.

Non-Delivery of Letters on Early Closing Days.

MR. LEVY (Leicestershire, Loughborough): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he will inform the House of the number and names of towns where the delivery of letters in the afternoon of the early closing days of the respective districts does not take place; and whether he will consider the desirability of extending the system of non-delivery in the afternoon of the early closing days.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton). The information asked for by the hon. Member is not readily available; but I may say that it is already usual, in all cases where the circumstances admit and the local authorities are in favour of such a course, to make some arrangement of the kind described on early closing days.

Appointment of Volunteer Adjutants.

MR. FIENNES (Oxfordshire, Banbury): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that the better standard of efficiency that has been attained by the Yeomanry and Volunteers is due to the circumstance that the adjutants since the War in South Africa have been more carefully selected, better qualified, and more up to date than previously, he will consider the desirability of not making any alteration in the system.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The question of the appointment of adjutants to the Territorial Force is one of considerable importance, and many representations on the subject have been forwarded for my consideration. The whole matter is under close consideration by the general staff, and I am not in a position at the present moment to make any definite statement as to what course ought to be adopted.

Strength of Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers—War Service.

MR. FIENNES: To ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state the strength of the Militia, Volunteers, and Yeomanry at the date they were called upon for special service in South Africa; and what percentage from each of these branches of the Auxiliary Forces actually served in the War.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane). The enrolled strengths were as follows:—

Militia, on 1st October, 1899 -	98,050
Yeomanry, at date of inspection, July or August, 1899 -	9,947
Volunteers, on 1st November, 1899 - - - -	222,584

The following numbers actually went to South Africa:—

Militia - - - - -	45,566
Yeomanry - - - - -	2,789
Volunteers (includes those who joined the C.I.V., Volunteer Service Companies, and Imperial Yeomanry) -	26,065

Meat Inspection in Scotland.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, College): To ask the Secretary for Scotland if his attention has been called to the fact that where local authorities in Scotland carry out the Public Health Act of 1897 dealing with meat inspection, consignors of live pigs and pig carcases, rather than run the risk of condemnation by these local authorities, forward their live stock to the surrounding districts, where the authorities are less stringent, whence they find their way in the form of cured hams into the proscribed localities; whether he is aware that this is a disadvantage to those who seek to carry out the law; and whether he will insist on equality of standard of meat inspection for all local authorities.

[†] See (4) Debates, clxxii., 749-52.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The attention of the Board has been called to this practice, and they have instructed inquiry to be made into it.

Mr. WATT: To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the inquiry into the methods of meat inspection by the officers of local authorities in Scotland has now been completed; and if he will report the results of that inquiry.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) As I have already informed my hon. friend, the inquiry will shortly be completed. The question of communicating the result of the inquiry will receive my careful consideration.

Infants and Children in Public Houses.

Mr. FIENNES: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet obtained any reports on the subject of women taking their infants and young children to the public houses in London and other large towns; and, if so, whether he can lay them upon the Table.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I have received some reports on this subject and I am asking for further information in connection with them. When I have received it I will communicate with my hon. friend.

Financial Deficiencies in Working of Irish Land Act.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury, if his attention has been called to the stoppages which have been made out of certain grants payable to County Councils in Ireland to meet alleged financial deficiencies in the working of the Irish Land Act of 1903; can he state how these deficiencies have arisen; if he is aware that, if the Treasury persist in their present action, it will have the effect of dislocating local government all over Ireland and also have a most injurious effect on the progress of land purchase in Ireland; and will he publish the rules under which the Treasury have acted in this matter.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) Under Section 29 (2) of the Irish Land Act, 1903, the Guarantee Fund is liable to make good any deficiency on the Income Account of the Irish Land Purchase Fund. So far as these deficiencies are caused by the issue of guaranteed stock at a discount, the Ireland Development Grant, as one of the constituent parts of the Guarantee Fund, is the first to be charged under Section 38; so that no charge for deficiencies arising from that cause can fall on the Local Taxation Grants so long as the Ireland Development Grant is able to meet them. But there are other deficiencies on the Income Account with which the Local Taxation Grants, as constituents of the Guarantee Fund, are directly chargeable, and I fear there is no possibility of avoiding the occurrence of such deficiencies when advances at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. interest are provided for by the public issue of stock bearing the same rate of interest, and no margin is allowed between the rate of interest payable and the rate of interest receivable to cover incidental losses. These losses arise from the following causes:—

(1) Arrears of payment of the purchase annuities;

(2) The system of issuing stock entitled to a half-year's dividend on the first following dividend day, although the subscribers to the stock are allowed to pay up their subscription by instalments which may extend up to, or even beyond, that dividend day. It is clear that, when the National Debt Commissioners have to pay a half-year's dividend on a certain day, and have not had the use of the money for a full six months before that day, a deficiency must result;

(3) The gale day on which the purchase annuities are payable is in each case one month earlier than the dividend day. This interval is necessary to enable the annuities to be collected and paid over to the National Debt Commissioners before the dividend day. But the result is that the payment received from a tenant on his first gale day includes interest for one month less than the period in respect of which dividend is payable on the stock;

(4) The capital of the Land Purchase Fund, so far as not required for advances, is temporarily invested by the National Debt Commissioners in securities. The interest on these securities is received on varying dates, and at the date when the balance of the Income Account must be struck there is always a temporary deficiency due to the fact that a certain amount of interest which has accrued has not yet been received into the account;

(5) On large transactions, such as those of the Land Purchase Fund, it is impossible to have the whole of the capital moneys invested and earning interest on every day of the year. There must always, therefore, be a loss of income from unproductive balances.

A careful analysis of the charge of £70,996 which has been made upon the Local Taxation Grants shows it to be attributable to these five causes in the following proportions:—

(1) Arrears of annuities - -	9,119
(2) Unearned dividend on issues of stock - - - -	23,750
(3) Advance dividend - -	13,650
(4) Interest due but not received -	15,500
(5) Unproductive balances - -	8,977
	£70,996

The arrears of purchase annuities are for the most part temporary. I understand that since the account was made up on 31st January last a sum of £4,046 has been recovered on account of the £9,119 then in arrear. The chief item of charge is the unearned dividend of £23,750 arising out of the mode of issue of the stock, which is required by custom and the convenience of the City. It is open to question whether this charge could not properly be treated as a capital charge to be paid for by annuity out of the Development Grant. But an amendment of the Act would be necessary to enable this to be done, as the Act at present requires (Section 29) (1), that the dividends on the stock shall be paid out of the income of the fund. The advance dividend charge will not be made good until the purchase annuities are completed, many years hence. A further charge of the same kind must arise on every issue of the stock. The deficiency of income which arises from unproductive balances is an inevitable and a permanent loss. The only charges which are of a temporary nature are those relating to arrears and to interest accrued but not received. After analysing and reviewing all the charges, I have come to the conclusion that it should be possible to avoid charging the Local Taxation Grants in full for those items by making use of the working balance which was rendered available by the Labourers Act of last Session, and I propose to have the Treasury Rules amended to enable this to be done. I may add that the Treasury Rules were published in House of Commons Paper, No. 151, of 1905.

Weight of Metal in Ships.

VISCOUNT TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if any method exists by which the total weight of metal on a ship can be arrived at; and, if so, whether steps will be taken to find out such weight before any of His Majesty's ships are sold to be broken up.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The only way of arriving at the total weight of metal on a ship would be to refer to the records of the weighing-in of the ship of her class selected for weighing at the time of the building, due allowance being made for non-metallic materials and for weights withdrawn or added in her subsequent history. The calculation would be rather elaborate and the result approximate only and not commensurate with the labour involved. It is, therefore, not proposed to adopt the course suggested by the noble Lord.

House of Commons Newspaper Reading Room.

Mr. WATT: To ask the First Commissioner of Works if he can see his way to provide a new newspaper reading room, so that Members may not be forced to read the daily papers in a thoroughfare.

(Answered by Mr. Harcourt.) I have not at present been able to discover any other suitable room, but I should welcome suggestions from Members.

Bombay Municipal Elections.

Mr. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether, with reference to the recent Bombay municipal elections and the public meeting of protest held in Bombay regarding them on 7th April, he will consider the advisability of suggesting to the Indian Government that in future officers of Government should not be allowed to offer themselves as candidates for election on municipalities and district boards, especially as the Government has the right of nominating an adequate number of members to represent them on such bodies.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) As at present advised, I am not prepared to lay down a general rule such may hon. friend suggests.

The Colonial Conference and Treatment of British Indians in the Colonies.

Mr. LYNCH (Yorkshire, W.R., Ripon): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has instructed the representative of India at the Colonial Conference to raise the question of the treatment of His Majesty's Indian subjects in self-governing British Colonies.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The question will certainly be discussed with the representatives of the Colonies, but whether in full conference, or in what other form, I cannot at present say.

Deaths from Plague in India.

Dr. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): To ask the Secretary of State for India how many deaths have occurred in India from plague since the outbreak in 1896; how many deaths from plague have been reported for each week during this year, 1907; and which provinces are the most affected.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The recorded deaths from plague in India, including Native States, from September, 1896, to end of March, 1907, are approximately 5,012,000. The monthly Returns which I receive from India show 58,438 deaths in January, 98,397 deaths in February, 171,522 deaths in March of the present year. I hope that the hon. Member will be satisfied with monthly totals. The provinces most affected are the United Provinces, the Punjab, Bengal, and Bombay.

Indian Medical Service.

Dr. RUTHERFORD: To ask the Secretary of State for India what is the number of officers of the Indian medical service now on duty in India, exclusive of those attached to regiments; and what is the number of medical officers especially deported for plague work, exclusive of civil surgeons and officers in other medical work.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The Government of India will be asked for the Return. I will lay it when received upon the Table.

English Medical Men Engaged on Indian Plague Work.

Dr. RUTHERFORD: To ask the Secretary of State for India how many medical men from England from time to time have been engaged by the Secretary of State for plague work in India; and how many of those medical men are now on special plague duty.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I will ask the Government of India to have the Return prepared, and will lay it upon the Table when I receive it.

Plague Precautions in India.

Dr. RUTHERFORD: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether the recommendations to the Indian Government by Professor Simpson, late medical officer of health to Calcutta, to introduce a special sanitary service composed of Indian medical men and women supervised by European experts, and repeated in his work on plague, have been carried out to stay and prevent the ravages of plague.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I would refer my hon. friend to the published Resolution of the Government of India, dated 8th September, 1904, creating the office of Sanitary Commissioner, in which is described the action taken by them in various schemes for the constitution of a separate sanitary service, and the difficulties, financial and administrative, in the way of an effective and speedy reorganisation. Much has been done to strengthen and improve the existing sanitary agency at the disposal of local governments, especially in districts where plague is liable to occur. The subject is still engaging the anxious consideration of the Government.

Arrears of Tenant Purchasers' Annuities Chargeable to County Kildare.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Kildare, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the amount (if any) chargeable to the county of Kildare in respect of net advances made by the Guarantee Fund after deducting repayments out of current instalments of annuities in the years ended the 12th day of February, 1906 and 1907, respectively; what is the amount certified for chargeable to the same county and drawn from the Guarantee Fund in respect of purchasers' half-yearly payments in arrear, and the amount of repayments to Guarantee Fund of such arrears recovered for the year ending the 31st January, 1907, the amount certified for in respect of insufficiency of income chargeable to the same county and drawn from the Guarantee Fund under Section 29 of the Irish Land Act, 1903; will he state the terms of the rule under which a county, not in arrear in its payments, may be made liable for dividends in respect of sales of land in other counties, and how the grants in aid of local taxation in counties not in arrear are made applicable to the purposes of the Guarantee Fund.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The net amount chargeable to county Kildare in respect of arrears of tenant purchasers' annuities was £1,695 18s. 3d. in 1905–6, but in 1906–7 the repayments exceeded the arrears by £928 7s. 9d., viz., arrears drawn from Guarantee Fund £1,780 5s. 4d. and arrears recovered £2,708 13s. 1d. The net amount charged to the same county under section 29 (2) of the Act of 1903 in respect of deficiency of income has been £7,714 12s. 8d. The certificates of the amounts chargeable to the several counties are prepared under Rule 10 (2) of Treasury Rules and Regulations, dated 14th April, 1905, published in House of Commons, Paper No. 151, of 1905.

The Ballingeary Disturbances—Action of Mr. O'Hara, Resident Magistrate.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, when issuing warrants for the arrest of some parties charged with offences arising out of the Ballingeary disturbances, Mr. O'Hara, resident magistrate for the Macroom district, framed the warrants in such a fashion that the persons against whom they were issued should, when arrested, be brought before himself and no other; will he say if it is the usual practice for resident magistrates to exercise a power of this kind; and will he offer any explanation of the course adopted by Mr. O'Hara, which reflected on the character and impartiality of the ordinary justices of the peace.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The fact is as stated in the first part of the Question. The warrants were issued on 6th October last. The resident magistrate acted within his powers as a justice of the peace in directing, in the warrants, that the persons against whom they were issued should be brought before himself. The adoption of such a course by Mr. O'Hara or any other justice of the peace does not reflect upon the impartiality of other magistrates.

Extra Police in County Clare.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any extra force of police has recently been drafted into the district around Confin and Kilnaboy, county Clare; and, if so, can he state the strength of the force and the reason they were sent to that part of the county; and whether he is aware that threatening notices were recently posted up in this neighbourhood.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) An extra force of twelve policemen has recently been drafted into the district referred to in order to provide for the preservation of the peace. The police have reported that threatening notices have recently been posted up in the locality.

Division of Untenanted Land on the Colonel Westropp, Doonas, Estate.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners got 170 acres of untenanted land on the Colonel Westropp, Doonas, estate to divide among the tenants of that estate having small holdings, and how long is it since they got the division of this land; whether, whilst they intended to make seventeen divisions, they will consider the desirability of increasing the number of divisions so that a greater number of the poorer tenants would get a division; and will he say when is the division to take place, as there is a question of getting additional untenanted land in the neighbourhood which would be already obtained but for the delay in the division of this land.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that in this case 175 acres of untenanted land are being sold to them. The Commissioners specially expedited the inspection, and have since had the land divided into seventeen parcels for distribution. Steps are at present being taken to obtain the signatures to purchase agreements of the seventeen persons selected as purchasers, and as soon as this has been done the purchasers will be put into possession. The Commissioners consider that the division of the lands which they have made is the most suitable in the circumstances, and cannot now re-open the matter.

Increase of Salary for Staff of Dublin Botanical Gardens.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when the labourers, gardeners, and general staff of the Royal Botanic Gardens, Glasnevin, Dublin, may expect to get the small increase of salary which they recently applied for; and when they may expect to get off on Saturdays at one o'clock, the same as at the Royal Gardens, Kew, and other places.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The scale of remuneration of the general staff of the Royal Botanic Gardens, Glasnevin, has recently been revised, and increases of pay have been sanctioned in certain cases. The new arrangements will take effect as from the first instant, but increments on the new scales will not be allowable until the expiration of one year from that date. It has also been arranged to grant a Saturday half-holiday to such of the staff as can be spared without inconvenience.

Irish Poor Rates—Disfranchisement for Non-Payment.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that a number of Parliamentary and Local Government Board electors are annually disfranchised by reason of the non-payment of poor rates within the statutory period for payment; whether he is aware that the poor rate is now annually struck by the county council about the month of May in each year, and that such rate, in order to qualify for the franchise, must be paid on or before the 1st July of the following year, and that the collectors of poor rate under the Orders made by the Local Government Board must now lodge the full amounts of the rates within fixed periods; whether the disfranchisement referred to arises from the fact that the rate collectors in numerous cases fail to require payment from the occupiers until after the time has lapsed, in other words, until after the 1st July of the following year; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of the Order of the Local Government Board requiring that the rate collectors should finally close their accounts and proceed for all recoverable rates before the next rate is made, in order that the ratepayers concerned should not be disqualified by the action of the rate collector.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Local Government Board have no information as to the first part of the Question. The poor rate is now usually struck in the months of April and May, and the latest date for paying the rate, in order to be qualified for the franchise, is the 1st July of the following year. The ratepayer has, therefore, over a year in which to pay his rates before he can be disfranchised. One poor rate is made for the whole of the year, but this may be collected in two moieties. Under the Public Bodies Order the poor rate collectors are required to close their collections at the end of each half-year, namely, on 30th September and 31st March. It is the practice of county councils to insist that the poor rate collectors shall close the year's collection on 31st March in each year, and in order to be able to lodge the full amount of their warrants at that date it is necessary that every effort should be made by the collectors by means of summons and distress to collect the rate from the occupiers. Provision is made under the Public Bodies Order for refunding to collectors under prescribed conditions the amount of rates which they have failed to recover for sufficient reason. The latter recoverable rates are carried forward to the next year's collection for recovery as arrears with the first moiety of the current year. It therefore follows that if the county and urban district councils comply with the prescribed requirements the rate collectors should have no difficulty in sending out the demands in the month of May, in which case persons in arrears have ample time to pay the rates in time to prevent disfranchisement. As a matter of fact less than one per cent. of the rate is carried forward in each year. In the circumstances a new Order, such as is suggested in the Question, appears to be unnecessary.

Deduction from Grant to County Sligo in Respect of Land Purchase.

Mr. P. A. McHUGH (Sligo, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a sum of £1,506 19s. 7d. has been deducted, in respect of land purchase, from grants payable to the county council of Sligo in the month of March, 1907; and can he state what loss, if any, will be sustained by the urban district council of Sligo in consequence of this deduction.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The amount deducted in the case of county Sligo is correctly stated in the Question. A sum of £66 17s. 5d. has been deducted directly from the share of the Sligo urban district. In addition the ratepayers in the urban district will have to make good about £79, as part of the deduction made from the share of the guardians of the Sligo Union.

Building of New Schoolhouse at Gortnacart.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, having regard to the fact that upwards of seven years ago, at the instance of the late Reverend Peter Kelly, P.P., the manager of the national school, Gortnacart, county Donegal, a grant was sanctioned for the building of a new schoolhouse, but that the Commissioners, owing to want of money, induced Father Kelly to await the settlement of the question of the plans and estimates for schoolhouses, now that the Treasury has consented to make a grant of £40,000 for three years for the purpose of repairing and building schools, steps will be taken to secure that the building of a new schoolhouse at Gortnacart, owing to the priority and urgency of the claim, and the report of every inspector of the unsatisfactory and insanitary condition of the present temporary schoolhouse, be forthwith undertaken and speedily brought to completion.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Commissioners of National Education are desirous that steps should at once be taken to provide new premises for the Gortnacart national school; and, as the new standard plans and specifications for national school buildings, though agreed upon in principle, will not be ready for some time, the Commissioners propose to invite the manager to submit special plans in this case.

Arrests at Athenry—Legal Aid for Accused.

Mr. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what time elapsed between arrest and sentence of men arrested at Athenry, county Galway, upon the 5th inst.; were they afforded an opportunity of being legally represented at the trial; where did it take place; and were the public admitted to same.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The persons referred to were separately arrested on 5th instant at times varying from 10.45 a.m. till 12.30 p.m. Three of the arrests were made in Athenry Fair. The men were taken before the resident magistrate at 12.45 p.m. at the Athenry police station, where the hearing took place. I am informed that the accused persons did not express any desire to be legally represented and that the public did not seek to be admitted to the hearing of the case.

Kerry County Council and Sir C. Cameron, Public Analyst.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Kerry County Council have notified Sir C. Cameron that they do not require his services further as public analyst; that they did so only after they had been put to considerable inconvenience and expense by inaccurate analyses made by him; whether similar complaints have been made in Waterford and Wexford; and whether, under those circumstances, the Local Government Board will refuse the request of the council; and, if so, will they (the Local Government Board) pay the cost of all prosecutions which fail because of incorrect analysis.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The reply to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. The complaint made by the county council against Sir Charles Cameron had reference to an unsuccessful prosecution for depriving milk of its fats. It appears that Sir Charles Cameron's certificate differed from those of Somerset House and of the Cork analyst. Sir Charles Cameron states that the milk was analysed twice with great care, that it was partially decomposed when he received it, and that as there was an excess of fat in the sample sent to Somerset House there may have been separation of the milk constituents when the sample was taken. A somewhat similar case arose last year in county Wexford. The Local Government Board have no record of a similar case in county Waterford. A public analyst cannot be removed without the approval of the Local Government Board; and the Board have informed the county council that no sufficient grounds have been advanced to warrant the dismissal of Sir Charles Cameron from his position as public analyst for the county. The reply to the concluding portion of the Question is in the negative.

Sale of the Morrogh Bernard Estate.

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state whether the sale of the Morrogh Bernard Estate, county Kerry, will be sanctioned by the Estates Commissioners until all the evicted tenants on it are reinstated.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) Before sanctioning advances for the purchase of the estate mentioned, the Estates Commissioners will fully investigate the cases of all evicted tenants who seek reinstatement upon it, and will endeavour to arrange for the restoration of such as are qualified.

Conversion of 15-Pounder Field Guns.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the conversion of the 15-pounder field gun with which it is proposed to arm the Territorial Army has in any way affected the ballistics of the gun.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The reply is in the negative.

Militia Officers and the New Reserve of Officers.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether Militia officers will be able to join the new reserve of officers recommended by Sir E. Ward's Committee; and, if so, what their training and remuneration will be, and whether they will retain their existing rank.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The recommendations of Sir E. Ward's Committee are still under consideration, and at present it is impossible to say what terms will be offered to the new Reserve officers, or what amount of training they will receive. When the new Reserve is formed, Militia officers wishing to join it will be able to do so in their present rank, provided they are within the limit of age laid down for Reserve officers.

Duke of York's School—Accommodation at Chelsea and Dover—Disposal of Site.

Mr. HORNIMAN (Chelsea): To ask the Secretary of State for War how many boys are now accommodated at the Duke of York's School, Chelsea, and how many will be provided for at the new school at Dover; when it is expected that the transference will take place; is it proposed to develop the land for building purposes, and has any scheme been prepared; and, if so, does it include any open space or garden which will be available for public use; and, should there be a balance of profit on the sale of the buildings and land after erecting the new school, to what object will the proceeds be devoted.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) 550 boys are now accommodated at the school at Chelsea, and 480 boys will be provided for in the new school. The Queen Victoria Memorial School in Scotland will provide additional accommodation for 275 sons of sailors and soldiers. It is hoped that the buildings will be ready before the end of 1908. As regards the other points raised in the Question no decision has yet been reached in regard to the disposal of the site of the present school.

Young Men's Christian Association and the Wilts and Gloucester Volunteer Infantry Brigade Camp.

Mr. PARTINGTON (Derbyshire, High Peak): To ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that the Brigadier-General commanding the Wilts and Gloucester Volunteer Infantry Brigade has refused permission to the Young Men's Christian Association to erect a recreation tent in the camp this year at Lulworth, although permission has always been given in the past; and, if so, whether he is prepared to ask the Brigadier-General to reconsider his decision.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Nothing is known of this matter at the War Office, and the question has been referred to the local military authorities.

Deaths due to Violence in Macedonia.

Mr. LYNCH: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state the number of violent deaths which occurred in the three vilayets of Macedonia for the periods from the 1st October, 1905, to the end of February, 1906, and from the 1st October, 1906, till the end of February, 1907; and whether he will obtain statistics showing the number of deaths due to violence in these vilayets for each month for the years 1905, 1906, and for the expired portion of 1907.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) His Majesty's Government have no complete records of the numbers of violent deaths in Macedonia previous to December 1905. The following are the figures for the months from and including December 1905 up to the end of February last:—

	February	56
	April	223
	May	243
	June	151

	August	76
	September	120
	October	99
	November	73
	February	56

For the causes of these I must refer the hon. Member to my previous Answer to him on the 16th.†

Southampton Trunk Line Telephone Facilities.

Lieutenant-Colonel PHILIPPS (Southampton): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the trunk line telephonic facilities at Southampton are in need of improvement; and what steps, if any, are being taken to place the service on a more efficient footing.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Two additional trunk lines between Southampton and London will be brought into use in the next few months. Their completion has been seriously delayed by wayleave difficulties. Additional lines to Portsmouth, Bournemouth, Salisbury, and the Isle of Wight from Southampton are also being provided for the improvement of the trunk service.

Pauper Relief at Leicester, Poplar, West Ham and Woolwich.

MR. C. NICHOLSON (Yorkshire, W.R., Doncaster): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state the number, ratio per thousand, and cost of in-maintenance and out-relief of paupers in the unions of Leicester, Poplar, West Ham, and Woolwich for the last four years.

Agricultural Labourers on the Continent.

Mr. PARTINGTON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the number of agricultural labourers and of other people employed in agriculture in France, Germany, Italy, Spain, and Austria-Hungary for the years 1881, 1891, and 1901.

(Answered by Mr. Kearley.) The information asked for by the hon. Member can only be given for years in which a census of occupations was taken in the countries covered by the Question. The attached statement embodies all the information available for each country since 1880:—

Statement showing the total number of persons engaged in agriculture and of agricultural labourers in the under-mentioned countries and years:—

(Note.—The occupations included under the term agriculture vary in the Census reports for the different countries.)

Cost of Visit to India of the Amir of Afghanistan.

Mr. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): To ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state the total amount of expenses entailed upon the Indian Government by the visit of the Amir of Afghanistan.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley).—The total expenditure entailed on the Government of India by the Amir's visit was £205,900, made up as follows:—Expenditure directly connected with tour, £124,500; Military concentration at Agra, £36,700; Viceregal visit and Chapter of the Order of the Bath and the Indian Orders at Agra, £44,700.

Condition and Hours of Labour in Bombay Textile Factories.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): To ask the Secretary of State for India when he expects to receive the Report from the Government of India as to the conditions and hours of labour in the textile factories of Bombay.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I expect to receive the Report of the Committee in the course of next month.

Meetings of the Commissioners for Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland.

MR. McKILLOP (Armagh, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how often did the Commissioners for Charitable Donations and Bequests in Ireland meet during the twelve months preceding 23rd November, 1906, to consider applications under Section 2 of 30 and 31 Vic., cap. 54, and business incidental thereto; how many of such meetings were attended by each of the Commissioners; and whether the Commissioners are entitled to decline to state to an applicant any ground for their refusal to give an opinion or advice.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I have referred this Question to the Secretaries to the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests, who inform me that they will submit it to the Commissioners at their meeting on 24th instant. If the hon. Member will renew the Question after that date, I will furnish him with the Commissioners' answer.

Assaults on Postal Officials in Ireland.

MR. ABEL SMITH (Hertfordshire, Hertford): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has taken steps to protect His Majesty's Post Office employees, in view of the assaults and robberies of mails which have recently taken place at Inchigeela, Ballinaglevagh, Ballinagree, and at other places.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The police authorities have issued the necessary instructions to the local police in the matter. Protection will be afforded in all cases in which it may be necessary.

Irish Boys and the Dublin Telegraph Messenger Service.

MR. ABEL SMITH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the incitement to Dublin parents to keep their children out of the Dublin telegraph messenger service on the grounds that it has for some years past worked as a means of forcing boys into the British Army; and whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The police have no information that parents have been interfered with in this matter. The supply of candidates for appointment in the Dublin telegraph messenger service largely exceeds the demand. No action in the matter appears to be called for.

Disturbances at Athenry.

MR. ABEL SMITH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, after a meeting held at Athenry on Sunday, the 7th instant, addressed by several Members of Parliament, a man named Ryan, a bailiff and gamekeeper on the Rooney property, was attacked by a mob returning from the meeting, and stabbed, so that his life has been endangered; whether any arrests have been made by the police; and whether he intends to take any special measures to restore order and protect life and property in this district.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) In this case four men have been arrested, and remanded on bail to petty sessions on 26th instant. It would be contrary to practice and undesirable to enter into details while the case is sub judice. An extra force is stationed in the district in order to provide for the preservation of the peace.

Irish Education Rates.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what proportion of the 6s. 7¼d. annually expended per head of the Irish population on public education is raised from Irish sources.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The figures quoted in the Question are taken from the Answer which I gave to the Question of the hon. Member for South Down on the 7th instant.† If the noble Lord will refer to that Answer he will find it specifically stated that all the expenditure there indicated is borne on the Votes of Parliament or the Consolidated Fund.

Inspection of Farm of the Ormaithwaite Estate.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state if the farm on the Ormaithwaite estate, from which Thomas Walsh, Coolaclarig, North Kerry, was evicted, has been inspected; and, if so, with what result; and whether he can state why he has not been reinstated.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have received an application from Thomas Walsh and have had the case inquired into. They have informed the owner of the amount which they are prepared to advance Walsh for the purchase of his former holding, and their offer is at present under the owner's consideration.

Sittings of the New Grand Committees.

SIR SAMUEL SCOTT (Marylebone, W.): To ask the Prime Minister on how many days each week he proposes that the Grand Committees should sit.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the total number of officers of captain's rank and above who are now serving in sea-going fleets with brevet rank, that is to say, captains serving as commodores, rear-admirals as vice-admirals, and vice-admirals as admirals; and what was the corresponding figure for April, 1902.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): The numbers in the sea-going fleets at the present time are as follows: Two captains serving as commodores, one rear-admiral as vice-admiral, one vice-admiral as admiral. On the 1st November, 1902, two captains were serving as commodores.

MR. BELLAIRS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in 1902 the Mediterranean Squadron consisted of fourteen battleships with a vice-admiral in command, where now it consists of six battleships with a vice-admiral given admiral's rank with admiral's pay, and a rear-admiral with vice-admiral's rank and pay?

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I believe that is so.

Coastguard and Life Saving.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the further reduction or abolition of the coastguard stations is in contemplation; if so, will he say what steps will be taken to secure that the work of life-saving from wrecks will not be seriously hampered, in view of the fact that the coastguard stations afford a means of rapidly communicating tidings of a wreck to the lifeboat stations, one-third of the number of launches made by the Royal National Lifeboat Institution's boats being made in response to communications from coastguard stations, and also in view of the fact that the coastguard rocket apparatus affords in many cases, as in that of the steamship "Jebba," the only means of saving life from wrecks where deep water comes close up to cliffs.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: No further reduction of coastguard stations is contemplated pending the consideration of the Report of the Interdepartmental Committee which has just been received.

Woolwich Arsenal Discharges.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many men have been discharged from Woolwich Arsenal since the 1st January, 1907.

† See (4) Debates, clxii., 939–40.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): Since the 1st January, 1907, the number of 382 men have been discharged from the Ordnance Factories, thirty-nine from the Inspection Department, Woolwich, and one from the Army Ordnance Department, Woolwich.

Territorial Forces Bill.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to allow the Territorial Forces Bill to be considered by one of the new Standing Committees.

MR. HALDANE: An intimation will be made on this subject in due course.

British Workmen's Report on German Labour Conditions.

MR. HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether in view of the fact that the six workmen lately returned from studying the conditions of the working classes in Germany have all reported that employers of labour in Germany are clamouring on all sides for skilled labour, he could see his way to applying to the German Government for a list of German employers willing to engage the workmen discharged or about to be discharged from Woolwich and other places.

MR. HALDANE: I fully appreciate the profound impression made on the mind of the hon. Member by the conclusion arrived at by six British workmen after a few weeks study of the economic and social conditions of the working classes of the entire German Empire. The Question is, however, one not of the depth of the hon. Member's impression, but of the reliability of the Report on which it rests. I, too, like the six British workmen have interested myself in the condition of the working classes in Germany. But my impressions are not identical with those of the deputation. I am, unfortunately, not in a state of mind to join in the enthusiasm of the hon. Member or in his joy over his discovery of his remedy for social difficulties.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon): Does the right hon. Gentleman suggest that the Report is inaccurate or untrue?

MR. HALDANE: No, Sir. I never employ such abusive epithets. What I do say is that six British workmen going for a few weeks to survey the whole conditions of the German Empire are not possibly able to give information on which a reliable opinion could be based.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the six workmen went to Germany for the purpose of surveying the social and industrial conditions there?

MR. HALDANE: I have no doubt it was a very pious intention, but you could hardly expect them to arrive at a reliable conclusion in six weeks, any more than you could expect them in the same period to arrive at a conclusive verdict on the subject of preference.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: But did they go to Germany to take a survey of the industrial and labour conditions of the Empire?

MR. HALDANE: I do not know whether they did or not. I presume they did. I am quite sure my hon. friend has gone to other countries, as I have done, in order to obtain as much information as possible, but I doubt if he would claim to be able to present a Report on which a reliable opinion could be based as a result of such a visit.

MR. HUNT: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that five of the six who went out were known believers in free trade?

MR. HALDANE: I was not aware of that.

War Office Pensions.

MR. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that, by the terms of his engagement, the ex-officer employed as a clerk in the War Office is eligible for a pension after ten years service, whereas the ex-soldier in similar employment can only obtain a gratuity after fifteen years service; what is the reason for this differential treatment; and whether he will consider the propriety of placing the latter on the same footing as the former with regard to pensions, Mr. HALDANE: When the employment of retired officers and ex-soldier clerks in the War Office was approved, the pay of the latter was deliberately fixed on a scale sufficiently liberal to exclude all claims to pension, while the pay of the former was based on the admission of a grant of pension. Under the conditions of the Superannuation Act the ex-soldier may be granted a gratuity on cessation of employment. The whole question was thoroughly reconsidered by a Committee two years ago, and it was decided that civil pensions should not be granted to ex-soldier clerks.

Mr. LEA asked if it were not the fact that an officer employed on clerical duties got forty-eight days leave while a warrant officer similarly employed was only allowed fourteen or fifteen days?

Mr. HALDANE replied that he could not go into details, but he believed that the facts referred to in the Question were all taken into consideration in fixing the pension.

Volunteer Corps Liabilities.

Sir J. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what would be the position of the officer commanding a Volunteer corps on the disbandment of the unit as regards current liabilities, if, as is laid down in Army Order 76 of 1896, the capitation grants are paid in advance; and what will be his position as regards current liabilities if the corps is transferred to the Territorial Forces.

Mr. HALDANE: As regards the first part of the Question, provision is made in Paragraph 602, Volunteer Regulations, for the issue of a grant on the disbandment of a unit should the Army Council think fit. As regards the second part of the Question, it is the intention that a Volunteer unit shall be transferred to the Territorial Forces as a going concern, and consequently all reasonable liabilities will be recognised.

Officers' Commissions.

Mr. LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many officers were given commissions in the cavalry and infantry of the Regular Army during the years ending 31st December, 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, and 1906, respectively.

I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for War how many officers were given combatant commissions as lieutenants or second lieutenants in the cavalry and infantry of the Regular Army who had previously served in the ranks (exclusive of riding-masters, quartermasters, band-masters, or other positions carrying honorary rank with them) during the years ending 31st December, 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, and 1906, respectively.

Mr. HALDANE: In reply to these Questions, if my hon. friend will kindly refer to the Return of Army Commissions granted during the years 1885 to 1906, which was recently presented to Parliament, he will find all the information he requires.

Mr. LEA: Is it not the fact that in that Return there is no differentiation made between the commissions given to officers of the Coast Brigade Royal Artillery and to quarter-masters, band-masters, and riding-masters, and therefore, so far as showing the number given for the ranks, the Return is practically useless?

Mr. HALDANE: I do not think that is so, but if my hon. friend will put down another Question I will inquire.

Cost of the Army.

Mr. GUY BARING (Winchester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the cost of the men on the Regular peace establishment of the Army, exclusive of India, serving with the colours or in Section A and B of the Army Reserve, has been or will be reduced under the new scheme; and, if so, by what amounts in each arm, and how is the reduction accounted for.

Mr. HALDANE: Eliminating the Special Contingent, the cost of Regular soldiers serving with the colours and in the Reserve is unaffected by the new scheme. If it should be ultimately decided to obtain a larger Reserve by a shorter colour service of a portion of the Horse and Field Artillery, this will reduce the cost of the Regulars of that arm on mobilisation from £74 17s. 4d. to £63 17s. 6d.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Am I right in understanding that the Return recently issued does not include any reduction whatever on the cost of the men now serving?

MR. HALDANE: No, it does not include any reduction on the cost of the men now serving, but the Special Contingent are taken into account in estimating the cost.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Then the Special Contingent has not been included as a separate item?

MR. HALDANE: No, it is taken into account.

Army Financial Administration.

*MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state to the House the grounds upon which, in the Army Order of 1st February last, the chief accountant of a military command in the United Kingdom has been placed upon the staff of the general in charge of administration; whether, in compliance with the terms of that Order, the general in charge of administration now deals directly with the chief accountant in matters of proposed military expenditure within his command; whether that Order in effect places the chief accountant under the control and orders of the general; and, if so, whether the personal liability of the chief accountant to make good every unauthorised expenditure in the command still subsists.

MR. HALDANE: The Army Order (No. 28 of February, 1907) alluded to by the hon. Member was, on the point referred to, altered in the text by a mere slip, and has been since corrected by the errata at the end of the Army Orders for March which remove the chief accountant from the staff of the general in charge of administration.

*MR. BOWLES: May I ask whether the making of this tremendous change in February last and its withdrawal before the end of March is part of the policy which the right hon. Gentleman has described as that of "clear thinking"?

MR. HALDANE: The MSS. is somewhat ambiguous and might have been interpreted in the sense suggested, but there was no intention of making any change without full consideration.

Reserve of Officers.

LORD J. JOICEY-CECIL (Lincolnshire, Stamford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the training of officers of the Reserve of Officers is suspended for the current year; and, if so, is any economy involved.

MR. HALDANE: The training of officers of the Reserve which for some years past has been non-existent will be formally suspended for the current year. As officers of the Reserve pay their own expenses when called out for training there is no question of economy involved.

Army Financiers in the Field.

SIR ROBERT HOBART (Hampshire, New Forest): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in connection with the new Territorial and Reserve Forces scheme, full provision was made on the war establishment for a financial adviser and his staff to accompany at once an expeditionary force on taking the field; and, if so, will he issue a Return to Parliament giving all necessary details.

MR. HALDANE: Provision has been made in the war establishments, recently promulgated, for a financial adviser and his staff to accompany an expeditionary force.

Nairobi Prison.

MR. GUY BARING: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state what sum is provided in the current Estimates for the new prison at Nairobi; and if the building will be completed during 1907–8.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): £5,000 is provided in the Estimates of the current year for the construction of a new prison at Nairobi. It will not be completed during the year.

Native Police in East Africa.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what complaints have been received from residents in the East African Protectorate with reference to the Native police force; and have such complaints been the subject of specific inquiry by the Colonial Office.

MR. CHURCHILL: As I informed the noble Lord in reply to his Question of Tuesday last, no specific complaints of misconduct by the police have reached the Secretary of State and accordingly no inquiry has been made. The Secretary of State has not, however, lost sight of the possibility of improving the force, and an Ordinance has recently been passed making better provision for its organisation and discipline.

Woolwich Artisans and Emigration.

CAPTAIN CRAIG (Down, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if a subordinate Department of the Colonial Office has been distributing leaflets about emigration amongst artisans recently dismissed from Government Departments at Woolwich.

MR. CHURCHILL: No, Sir; but the Emigrants Information Office which is under the supervision of the Colonial Office distributes information to inquirers and its circulars have been supplied to the Woolwich Distress Committee and public libraries; from these sources they have probably passed into the hands of artisans.

In reply to a further Question by Captain CRAIG,

MR. CHURCHILL said that if the hon. and gallant Gentleman could place at his disposal any information tending to lead him to believe the Answer was not in substance correct he would be glad to inquire into it.

West Indian Postal Arrangements.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the total sum paid by the taxpayers of the United Kingdom for the conveyance of local correspondence between the various West Indian islands amounts to £22,250 a year; to what Vote is that sum charged; and whether the taxpayers of the West Indian islands make any contribution towards the cost of conveying local correspondence between different parts of the United Kingdom.

MR. CHURCHILL: The amount mentioned by the hon. Member, which is made up as stated in the Answer I gave him to his Question of the 17th instant,† and which is charged to the Colonial Office Vote, is paid for the conveyance within the West Indies, not of local correspondence only, but also of correspondence sent between the Colonies served and the United Kingdom, Canada, and other places. The subsidy to the Canadian contract is not for postal purposes only or mainly.

New Hebrides.

MR. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): On behalf of the junior Member for the City of London, I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies who will represent the interests of Australia and New Zealand at the Joint Commission with France which will consider the details arising out of the New Hebrides Convention.

MR. CHURCHILL: It is hoped that Australia and New Zealand will be represented by a gentleman nominated by the Prime Ministers of the Commonwealth and of New Zealand, with whom I have been in communication on the subject.

Europeans in the Chinese Customs Service.

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether four European members of the Chinese Customs service have recently been replaced by Chinese; and, if so, whether these appointments were made with the concurrence of Sir Robert Hart, and fall within the purview of the arrangement to which it is understood the British Government last year consented.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury; for Sir EDWARD GREY): The hon. Member is probably referring to the recent appointment of four Chinese clerks to the rank of assistant in the Customs service. Three of these are in the Shui-wu Chu, or Revenue Council, at Peking, and the fourth remains at Tsingtan in the German leased territory, where he has been for some time. None of these officials have replaced Europeans, and in any case there is no reason to suppose that the position of Sir Robert Hart with regard to appointments in the Customs is altered.

Assault on British Subjects in China.

Mr. REES: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information regarding the assault committed at Wuchan upon the representative of Messrs. Jardine and Matheson; and whether he can give the House any information as to the conduct of the Chinese officials on the occasion.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: No information on the subject has reached my right hon. friend, but inquiry will be made of His Majesty's Minister in China.

Major ANSTRUTHER-GRAY: Will inquiry be made by cable as this is not the first assault on British subjects in China?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I will convey the hon. Member's wish to my right hon. friend.

New Hebrides Convention.

Mr. BARRIE: On behalf of the junior Member for the City of London, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when it is probable that the Anglo-French Commission, to consider the New Hebrides Convention, will meet.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: As my right hon. friend has already stated, the date has not yet been fixed, but the meeting of the Committee will not be long delayed. This Committee, however, is one for the purpose of settling the points described in Subsection 4 of Article 10 of the Convention.

The Carnegie Celebrations at Pittsburg.

Captain CRAIG: On behalf of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is able to explain why the British Empire was not officially represented at the celebrations connected with the opening of the Carnegie Institute, at Pittsburg, whereas other Powers, notably Germany, sent influential delegations and high Government officials to attend the ceremony.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Invitations were issued to the heads of foreign missions only, but had no official character. His Majesty's Ambassador had only just returned from an official visit to Canada, and had important business to transact in Washington, which made it impossible for him to absent himself again so soon, especially as during the following week he was due to attend the National Arbitration and Peace Congress Conference at New York, and a Conference at Philadelphia. Neither the German, Austro-Hungarian, French, nor Russian Embassies were represented at Pittsburg. It is understood that the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were represented at the celebrations at Pittsburg, and on such an occasion the presence of members of the greatest educational institutions of the country would appear to be the form of representation most suitable and convenient.

Mr. LEA asked if any communication or protest had been received by the British Ambassador on the subject.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I am not aware of any.

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Was there any Ambassador present from East Down?

British Representatives at the Hague Conference.

Mr. BYLES (Salford, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs can he now inform the House who will be the delegates representing Great Britain at the Hague Conference.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The British Plenipotentiaries to the Conference will be:—The right hon. Sir Edward Fry; the right hon. Sir Ernest Satow; the right hon. Lord Reay, late President of the Institute of International Law; Sir Henry Howard, His Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Hague. In addition naval and military expert delegates will be appointed, whose names will be announced in due course.

Teddington Rate Collector.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, although the general district rate and poor rate for the parish of Teddington, Middlesex, are claimed in the same demand note and by the same collector, it is the practice when such rates are not paid to issue two separate summonses, with 3s. costs on each summons; and will he state why in such cases the entire amount due is not claimed under one summons.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): On making inquiry in the matter I am informed that the Teddington justices now include both rates in one summons and have done so for some weeks past.

Taximeter Cab Fares.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the minimum fare for the hiring of hackney carriages in London is fixed by law; whether, having regard to the provisions of 30 and 31 Vic., c. 134, s. 26, and 32 and 33 Vic., c. 115, s. 9 (3), the recent order issued by the Home Office fixing fares for the hiring of hackney carriages furnished with taximeters at a sum less than the statutory minimum is within such provisions; and, if not, will the regulation to these fares be withdrawn.

MR. GLADSTONE: The only fares fixed by my recent Order for taximeter cabs are the fares set out in Schedule K for motor-cabs fitted with taximeters, to which—so I am advised by the Attorney-General—the provisions as to fares in Hackney Carriage Acts before 1869 do not apply. Horsed taximeter cabs are dealt with by Regulation 32, which merely lays down that the fares shall not exceed the fares payable by hirers of ordinary cabs. Any lower scale indicated by the taximeter as payable by the hirer would be a contract scale as recognised by Section 45 of the London Hackney Carriage Act, 1831.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR asked whether the minimum fare fixed by law was one shilling; whether motor-cabs, whether with or without taximeters, were hackney carriages; and how could the right hon. Gentleman within the provisions of the law fix a less fare than one shilling?

MR. GLADSTONE was understood to say that the Attorney-General had advised that this could be done, there being a distinction between a carriage driven by power and a carriage drawn by horses.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR asked whether he was to understand that a motor-car, with or without taximeter, was not a hackney carriage, although it plied for hire.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I am advised as I have stated.

Alexandra Park Races.

MR. LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the public nuisance caused to the neighbourhood by the races which take place from time to time at Alexandra Park; whether he is aware that the residents of Wood Green, Hornsey, and Harringay are continually protesting against it, on account of the number of scoundrels who attend these races from all parts of London; whether he is aware that, on the days that these races take place, police protection is totally inadequate in the neighbourhoods above mentioned and to the ordinary travelling public on the Great Northern Railway between King's Cross and Wood Green stations; and what steps does he propose taking to cause a cessation of the nuisance, or to provide increased police protection to the general public.

MR. GLADSTONE: No representations have been made to me to the effect of the first part of the Question. This racecourse is licensed annually by the county council, and persons who object to the crowds attending the races have an opportunity every year of opposing the grant of a licence. On the days when races take place special measures are taken by the police for preserving order on the roads and public places in the neighbourhood; but their action does not extend to the premises of the railway company, as these are the property of the company.

MR. LEA asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would cause inquiries to be made as to the facts dealt with in the Question.

MR. GLADSTONE assumed that, if a nuisance was created, representations would be made to him by those concerned, such as they were entitled to make if there was any deficiency of police protection. The main question was primarily one for the Middlesex County Council.

MR. BOTTOMLEY (Hackney, S.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any case has been brought to his notice of any outrage against either person or property on the part of any person attending Alexandra Park races for many years past?

MR. GLADSTONE: As far as I am aware no representations of the kind have been made to my Department.

Cost of Scottish Post Office Services.

MR. BARRIE: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General what was the cost of the Post Office services in Scotland for the Exchequer years 1894–5, 1899–1900, and 1904–5; and what was the revenue from these services during the same years.

Year.	Expenditure. £.	Revenue. £.
1894–5	1,020,000	1,314,000

Telegraphists' Duties.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he is aware that in certain districts the duties of the telegraph staff are very irregular and consequently arduous; and if he will cause inquiry to be made with the view of ameliorating the conditions of service.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: As my hon. friend is aware, the conditions of service of the telegraph staff and other postal servants are under the consideration of a Select Committee of the House. The Committee has not yet reported, but if the hon. Member will furnish me with particulars of any specific cases of which he has knowledge, in which he believes the duties of the telegraphists are unduly severe, I will have inquiry made respecting them.

Free Education.

MR. HAROLD COX: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether large grants of public money are now being made to schools attended almost exclusively by the children of well-to-do parents; and, if so, whether it is the policy of the present Government to relieve well-to-do persons of their parental duties at the expense of the taxpayer.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): The principle to which, if I understand aright, the hon. Member's Question refers in regard to the kind of secondary schools in respect of which Exchequer Grants can properly be paid, is one to which I have been giving special attention during the short time that I have been responsible for the Board of Education, and I am now considering certain changes in the forthcoming regulations for secondary schools which have a bearing upon it. I do not think the matter is one which can be satisfactorily dealt with within the limits proper to an Answer to a Question.

School Age Regulations.

MR. HUNT: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Board of Education whether he will consider the advisability of drawing the attention of county councils to the fact that they have power to pass a by-law exempting children under seven years of age from being compelled to attend school if the school nearest to their home is more than one mile.

MR. MCKENNA: My experience of county councils is fortunate enough to lead me to suppose that they do not require to be reminded of their powers, and I do not think there is any occasion to issue a circular such as the hon. Member suggests.

Irish Provident Assurance Company.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has yet completed his inquiries as to the solvency of the Irish Provident Assurance Company; whether, during the past two years, a number of policy holders ceased paying their premiums owing to fears of the insolvency of the company, and these premiums are now withheld without any compensation whatever being given to the policy holders; and whether he will have this whole matter inquired into, and some reparation made to the people who have been thus defrauded of their money.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. KEARLEY, Devonport): I must refer the hon. Member to the Answer given by my right hon. friend on the 21st March last year to the hon. Member for Mid Tipperary.† Since then no information has reached the Board of Trade that the Irish Provident Assurance Company are themselves carrying on life assurance business. Consequently the Board of Trade have no special powers with regard to the company. The only power vested in the Board of Trade for companies registered under the Companies Acts is that under Sections 56 and 57 of the Act of 1862 of appointing an inspector upon the application of members holding not less than one-fifth part of the whole of the shares of the company for the time being issued.

Public Companies and Political Funds.

MR. LEA: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, seeing the difficulty of getting evidence on the subject, if he will issue a circular to all public companies within and contiguous to the area of the administrative county of London carrying on their trade or business in virtue of powers conferred by various Acts of Parliament, public or private, asking them to make a Return showing what sums of money they have given during the last three years to societies, political or otherwise, the names of the recipients in each case, and the dates on which the donations were given.

MR. KEARLEY: I do not think that the Board of Trade could with advantage take the course suggested, but the whole question referred to is receiving very earnest consideration.

Coal Statistics.

MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total quantity of coal produced in the United Kingdom in the year 1906; and what percentage the amount exported bore to the total produced.

MR. KEARLEY: The quantity of coal produced in the United Kingdom in 1906 was about 251,000,000 tons. The exports, including bunker coal and also the coal equivalent of the exports of coke and patent fuel amounted to 76,750,000 tons or about 30·6 per cent. of the production. If bunker coal be excluded the proportion would be reduced to about 23·2 per cent.

Customs Duties.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will state what was the approximate amount of Customs duties levied in 1906 (or 1905), and the estimated average rate of duty upon dutiable imports, in respect to goods coming from Natal, Ceylon, British West Indies, and British Guiana.

MR. KEARLEY: I regret that I can only refer the hon. Member to the Answer given by me to the hon. Member for the Govan Division on the 28th February.† No record is kept at the Customs of the country of origin of dutiable goods which are cleared for consumption.

British Museum Reading Room.

MR. LEA: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the gold-leaf used fifty years ago for the redecoration of the British Museum reading room was guaranteed as British made; and whether he can give an assurance that the firm who have the contract to redecorate the Museum will use only British made gold-leaf for regilding purposes in connection therewith.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): It is believed that the gold-leaf used in 1857 was of British manufacture: there is no record of any guarantee. The reply to the second paragraph is in the affirmative: it has been specified that British made gold-leaf only is to be used.

† See (4) Debates, clxx, 253.

Mr. BRIDGEMAN (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if his attention has been directed to the fact that the decoration of the reading room in the British Museum has been placed in the hands of Messrs. Waring and Gillow; if it is proposed that they shall use twenty-five tons of white lead in the process; if he is aware that in France the use of white lead is prohibited in Government contracts; and if he will consider the desirability of taking some steps in the present instance, and of prohibiting the use of white lead in the interior of Government buildings in future contracts.

Mr. HARCOURT: The contract has been placed with the firm named. No white lead will be used, as the paint has been specified to have a zinc oxide base. This specification is adopted in all contracts for Government buildings.

Women Typists.

Mr. THORNTON (Clapham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the petition recently presented to the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury by women typists in the Government service asking for an increased maximum salary; and whether, in view of the present low maximum and the entire absence of promotion in this class, he will say if a favourable reply may be expected at an early date.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: The memorial has been received and is still under consideration.

Mr. THORNTON: Can the hon. Gentleman say when an answer may be expected?

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I cannot at present.

Norwegian Trawlers and Scottish Fishermen.

Mr. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is aware of the damage done to fishermen's nets off Wick by the Norwegian trawler "Campania," and whether, in view of the fact that the owners of the said vessel have declined to pay any compensation, he will bring the matter before the Norwegian representative in this country.

The SECRETARY for SCOTLAND (Mr. Sinclair, Forfarshire): The matter referred to by my hon. friend has been brought to my notice. Where damage has been done to fishermen's nets by foreign fishing vessels the form of procedure is for the aggrieved fishermen to submit their statement combined with an undertaking to go, if required, as witnesses to the country to which the accused boat belongs This, I am informed, they are unwilling to do in this case.

Beauly and Ness Fisheries.

Mr. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he can now state the names of the landlords who claim fishery rights to the estuary of the Ness and Beauly rivers; and to what extent those rights extend seawards from the mouth of the Beauly and Ness rivers, respectively.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I am making local inquiries into the matter referred to by my hon. friend and regret that they are not yet sufficiently complete to enable me to give an Answer. Perhaps he will kindly repeat the Question.

Paisley Licensing Case.

Mr. LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if his attention has been drawn to the remarks made by Sheriff Darling Lyell in regard to the case at Paisley, where two of the local magistrates, one a joiner named M'Naughton and the other a plumber named Kilpatrick, reported on structural alterations necessary at a licensed house, and where the joiner who undertook the reconstruction of the premises was the very Mr. M'Naughton who, in his capacity as magistrate, had ordered the work to be done to his own satisfaction and that of his brother magistrates; and where not only was this so, but the plumber who contracted to do the plumbing work to the orders of Mr. M'Naughton was the brother magistrate who also inspected, reported, and concurred in requiring this work to be done; and, having in view the foregoing facts, will he indicate what action he proposes to take in order to prevent the recurrence of such an incident.

Mr. SINCLAIR: As legal questions are involved I have submitted the Papers in this case to the law officers for their opinion.

Scottish Deer Forests.

Mr. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the action of Mr. Coates, the proprietor of the Glenbana estate, Aboyne, in turning tenants out of paying farms in order to extend the area of deer forests, and of Mr. Heaven, a neighbouring landlord, who is extending the area of grass on his estate and destroying houses, in order to preserve game and give opportunity for rabbit shooting; and whether the Government propose to take such action as will immediately prevent rural depopulation by such policies as those pursued by Mr. Coates and Mr. Heaven.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have no information as to the statements made by the hon. Gentleman. With regard to the intention of the Government on matters relating to rural depopulation I may refer him to the Small Landholders Bill now before the House.

Mr. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD: Is the right hon. Gentleman unable to get any information as to what is going on in this district?

Footpath Rights in Aberdeenshire.

Mr. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the refusal of the parish council of Birss, Aberdeenshire, to vindicate the public right to use a footpath which has been used for over fifty years; and whether, in view of the difficulties experienced in working the existing law and of the rapid disappearance of these public rights, he can see his way to introduce remedial legislation.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have no information on the subject referred to by the hon. Gentleman, and I can only repeat that the desire to preserve to the public all existing rights of way has the hearty sympathy of His Majesty's Government. I cannot give any undertaking now as to future legislation.

Mr. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that litigation has arisen, and that the failure of the parish councils to put the law into operation is causing a great deal of scandal?

Mr. SINCLAIR: I will give close attention to the matter.

Grassmarket, Edinburgh.

Mr. GULLAND (Dumfries Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he is aware that the Edinburgh Town Council has resolved to hold the market for sheep, and possibly also for cattle, in the street of the Grassmarket; and if he will consult the Local Government Board for Scotland as to whether this use of a public thoroughfare lined by dwelling houses and shops is in accordance with the sanitary regulations of the Board.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I have consulted the Local Government Board for Scotland who have no information on the point referred to by my hon. friend. It is not in the power of the Board to interfere unless a nuisance within the meaning of the Public Health Act should arise hereafter in consequence of the action of the Town Council.

Scottish Education Acts.

Mr. GULLAND: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, in connection with the Education (Scotland) Bill, he will introduce a Bill consolidating all the statutes with regard to education in Scotland, and so satisfy the demand of those administering these statutes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: While there would be advantages in passing such a consolidating measure, its preparation may more profitably be undertaken when the present legislative proposals of the Government as to education in Scotland have been given effect to. In any case it is quite impossible for the Government to undertake further legislation on the subject this session.

Port William Church Dispute.

MR. GULLAND: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland why the Churches (Scotland) Act Commission, notwithstanding the terms of their memorandum of 19th October, 1906, that it is only in very extraordinary circumstances that the Commissioners could hold that the Church which is entitled to the property by statistics should not possess the buildings, has allocated to the Free Church the church at Port William, although the Free Church there has no minister, no office bearers, and no Sunday services; whether there was any local investigation at Port William; and whether he can hold out any hope that the Commission will reconsider this case and allocate the church to the United Free Church, which is entitled to it by statistics.

MR. SINCLAIR: This is a very peculiar case, as those who are acquainted with the circumstances are aware; and after very careful consideration the Commission have come to the decision which has been announced. I have no option but to regard it as final; as this is a matter which the Act leaves entirely to the discretion of the Commission.

MR. GULLAND: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in 1906 the Free Church congregation presented a memorial to the Commissioners informing them of their intention of joining the United Free Church, and asking to have the property allocated? Why was not that carried out?

MR. SINCLAIR: I can only say that the whole of the facts were before the Royal Commission when they came to their decision.

Dangerous Lunatics.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether a dangerous patient in a district lunatic asylum may be discharged and handed over to relatives relieved, but not cured; and, in that case, whether the lunacy authorities have no further charge or responsibility.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. THOMAS SHAW, Hawick Burghs): A patient who, when admitted, was dangerous, may on the sheriff being satisfied and on medical certificates, be discharged when this can be done without risk of injury to the public or the patient. As to the latter part of the Question, it does not appear to me that there is any such charge or responsibility if the procedure is correctly followed.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he will consider the advisability of taking the necessary steps to ensure that all cases of dangerous lunatics who have committed assault resulting in loss of life should be dealt with in a criminal lunatic asylum, instead of relegating them to a district asylum.

I beg also to ask the Lord Advocate, whether, seeing that the presence of criminal lunatics who have committed murder is detrimental to the general freedom from severe discipline in district asylums, the beneficial effect of what is termed the open-door system being acknowledged, he will take the necessary steps to keep the district asylums as far as possible free from criminal lunatics who have committed murder or attempted murder.

MR. THOMAS SHAW: I may be allowed to answer these two Questions together. The sending of these cases to a district asylum is no doubt warranted if the procedure under the 15th Section of the Lunacy Act of 1862 is adopted. I may say, however, that the other course, which is also correct in law, appears to me to be more advisable in practice, viz., that when crime has been committed by a lunatic the criminal authorities should deal with it in accordance with their regular powers under Sections 87 and 88 of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1857. There may no doubt be exceptional cases, but my desire is that the practice which I think to be preferable should be adopted.

Irish Board of Works—Promotion of Clerks.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if seniority in the service and not in the department was held by the Board of Works to justify recent promotion, especially that of Mr. Sidwell in the Accountant's Branch of their office; if so, can he say why this principle was not applied by them in the case of a promotion in the Buildings Division of the Secretary's Branch made in the beginning of 1905, when a Second Division clerk of six years' service was promoted to a staff post, passing over a Second Division clerk in the same division of over twelve years' service; and whether the Board were aware when making this promotion that the promoted clerk was a Scottish Presbyterian while the clerk who was passed over was an Irish Catholic.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The promotions in both cases were made on grounds of merit and not of seniority as, in the case of Mr. Sidwell, I have already stated. I regret that the hon. Member should have thought fit, in view of my previous Answers, to put the last part of the Question.

Irish Land Act Finance.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if his attention has been called to the stoppages which have been made out of certain grants payable to county councils in Ireland to meet alleged financial deficiencies in the working of the Irish Land Act of 1903; can he state how these deficiencies have arisen; if he is aware that, if the Treasury persist in their present action, it will have the effect of dislocating local government all over Ireland, and also have a most injurious effect on the progress of land purchase in Ireland; and will he publish the rules under which the Treasury have acted in this matter.

MR. RUNCIMAN: Under Section 29 (2) of the Irish Land Act, 1903, the Guarantee Fund is liable to make good any deficiency on the Income Account of the Irish Land Purchase Fund. So far as these deficiencies are caused by the issue of Guaranteed Stock at a discount, the Ireland Development Grant, as one of the constituent parts of the Guarantee Fund, is the first to be charged under Section 38; so that no charge for deficiencies arising from that cause can fall on the Local Taxation Grants so long as the Ireland Development Grant is able to meet them But there are other deficiencies on the income account with which the Local Taxation Grants, as constituents of the Guarantee Fund, are directly chargeable, and I fear there is no possibility of avoiding the occurrence of such deficiencies when advances at 2¾ per cent. interest are provided for by the public issue of stock bearing the same rate of interest, and no margin is allowed between the rate of interest payable and the rate of interest receivable to cover incidental losses. These losses arise from the following causes:—(1) Arrears of payment of the purchase annuities. (2) The system of issuing stock entitled to a half year's dividend on the first following dividend day, although the subscribers to the stock are allowed to pay up their subscription by instalments which may extend up to, or even beyond, that dividend day. It is clear that, when the National Debt Commissioners have to pay a half-year's dividend on a certain day, and have not had the use of the money for a full six months before that day, a deficiency must result. (3) The gale day on which the purchase annuities are payable is in each case one month earlier than the dividend day. This interval is necessary to enable the annuities to be collected and paid over to the National Debt Commissioners before the dividend day. But the result is that the payment received from a tenant on his first gale day includes interest for one month less than the period in respect of which dividend is payable on the stock. (4) The capital of the Land Purchase Fund, so far as not required for advances, is temporarily invested by the National Debt Commissioners in securities. The interest on these securities is received on varying dates, and at the date when the balance of the income account must be struck there is always a temporary deficiency, due to the fact that a certain amount of interest which has accrued has not yet been received into the account. (5) On large transactions such as those of the Land Purchase Fund it is impossible to have the whole of the capital moneys invested and earning interest on every day of the year. There must always, therefore, be a loss of income from unproductive balances. A careful analysis of the charge of £70,996 which has been made upon the Local Taxation Grants shows it to be attributable to these five causes in the following proportions:—(1) Arrears of annuities, £9,119; (2) Unearned dividend on issues of stock, £23,750; (3) Advance dividend, £13,650; (4) Interest due but not received, £15,500; (5) Unproductive balances, £8,977; total, £70,996. The arrears of purchase annuities are for the most part temporary. I understand that, since the account was made up on 31st January last, a sum of £4,046 has been recovered on account of the £9,119 then in arrear. The chief item of charge is the unearned dividend of £23,750 arising out of the mode of issue of the stock which is required by custom and the convenience of the City. It is open to question whether this charge could not properly be treated as a capital charge to be paid for by annuity out of the Development Grant. But an amendment of the Act would be necessary to enable this to be done, as the Act at present requires (Section 29 (1)) that the dividends on the stock shall be paid out of the income of the fund. The advance dividend charge will not be made good until the purchase annuities are completed, many years hence. A further charge of the same kind must arise on every issue of the stock. The deficiency of income which arises from unproductive balances is an inevitable and a permanent loss. The only charges which are of a temporary nature are those relating to arrears and to interest accrued but not received. After analysing and reviewing all the charges, I have come to the conclusion that it should be possible to avoid charging the Local Taxation Grants in full for those items by making use of the working balance which was rendered available by the Labourers Act of last Session, and I propose to have the Treasury Rules amended to enable this to be done. I may add that the Treasury Rules were published in House of Commons Paper No. 151 of 1905.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: The Answer which the hon. Gentleman has given is of so long and complicated a character that it will be necessary for us to see it in print before we can thoroughly grasp its significance. But may I ask him if I am right in what I gather as to the meaning, so far as I have been able to gather it, that the charge put down against these counties is not a genuine charge; that is to say, nothing of the nature of a real or permanent charge, but more or less in the nature of a book-keeping charge, and will be wiped out in the ordinary course? Then I gather further that—the hon. Gentleman will tell me if I am right—the real permanent charge is this charge in connection with the unearned dividend of £23,000. If I am right in that, I wish to ask him this Question—Is it a fact that the Treasury have issued regulations to the effect that when land stock is issued to any person in, say, March or April, on the 21st June six months interest is to be paid to the owner of that stock, although not earned; and if so, whether that is not in violation of the 28th section of the Land Act, which specifically provides that interest on land stock is only to be paid at the rate of 2¾ per cent., and if that is so, are not the owners of this stock receiving for these two or three months more than interest at the rate of 2¾ per cent.? A further question—Out of the Development Grant £50,000 for four years was to be set aside to meet the charges on the working of the Land Act. What has become of the £200,000? Is it earning interest, and if so, why is not the interest devoted to meeting these charges? I will put further questions when I have opportunity.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: With regard to the last supplementary Question, I should like the hon. Gentleman to defer it. With regard to the first, as to the arrears of annuities, I cannot say how far they will be temporary or permanent. I have already said that about half of the arrears outstanding when the accounts were made out have since been paid. With regard to the second Question, as to the dividends paid for the short period, I quite admit that on the face of it the view which has been put forward by the hon. Member appears to have a good deal of reason behind it. He will be aware that we cannot always arrange for the issue of stock on the 31st December or 30th June. That is obvious, and in the flotation of a large loan like the last—£7,000,000—it is impossible to have the whole sum paid up upon one fixed date; so we are advised by those who want to place the stock to the best advantage. The third point has been already considered by the legal advisers of the Government, and I am afraid that they have decided against him.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: May I ask, does the new rule, to which the hon. Gentleman refers, have a retrospective effect, so as to apply to the sums now charged to the various counties in Ireland?

MR. RUNCIMAN: So far as the amount of interest is concerned, I am afraid that the new rule will not apply. The rules referred to by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford, were rules drawn by the Treasury.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if the sum of £50,000 per annum out of the Irish Development Grant has been duly carried to the income account of the Irish Land Purchase Fund for the last four years, in accordance with Section 38 of the Irish Land Act of 1903; if so, is the sum of £200,000 still available for the payment of dividends on Irish land stock in accordance with Section 29 of the said Act; is the whole or any part of the said sum of £200,000 still unexpended; if so, is interest accruing thereupon, and what is the amount of such interest, if any; is there from time to time a balance of funds arising from the sale of land stock on hand awaiting distribution amongst vendors of Irish lands; if so, is the same lying at interest at any bank or elsewhere, and what is the amount of such interest, if any; and is such interest as the above available for payment of the aforesaid dividends.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The sum of £200,000 has been paid from the Ireland Development Grant to the Income Account of the Irish Land Purchase Fund, and has to the extent of £102,000 been used in meeting deficiencies of income, there being originally no power to use it otherwise. Section 15 of the Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1906, however, directs that as from the 31st March, 1906, the unexpended portion of the £200,000 shall be used as a working balance, and shall not be reckoned as part of the Income Account of the Irish Land Purchase Fund in determining whether that income is insufficient under Section 29 (2) of the Irish Land Act, 1903. The working balance so obtained amounts to £98,000, and forms part of the general fund which is invested as closely as possible. All funds arising from issues of guaranteed $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. stock, so far as they are not required for the purpose of immediate advances, are invested in securities of a temporary nature. The income derived from such investments is applied towards payment of the dividends on the stock.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state what is done with the money raised for the purposes of the Land Purchase (Ireland) Act, 1903, during the interval between the issue of the stock and the payment of the money over to the landlords; whether the money is invested in any way; if so, what amount of interest is paid upon it; is it lodged in bank; if so, in what banks in England or Ireland, and do these banks pay any interest on the amount in hand; what is the amount already received under the various issues; how much of it is unallotted; how is it invested; and what interest is received upon it.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The money raised for the purposes of the Irish Land Act, 1903, is carried to the credit of the Irish Land Purchase Fund under Section 28 (4). This fund is under the control of the National Debt Commissioners, who invest the cash placed to its credit, so far as not required for immediate advances, in securities of a temporary nature. The uninvested portion of the fund is lodged at the Bank of England, but no interest is allowed. The total amount of cash received in respect of issues of stock is £18,823,839, of which £18,371,826 has been advanced under the Act, and the balance of £452,013 is invested in £160,000 Treasury bills at an average rate of interest of $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and £290,000 Exchequer Bonds at 3 per cent.

MR. HAYDEN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what amount of this money at one period was lying in the bank bearing no interest, and whether during any portion of that time any of the money was lying at the Bank of Ireland bearing no interest?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Is the right hon. Gentleman able to say, in view of the serious state of affairs which has arisen in connection with the finance of the Land Act, which seems to be completely broken down, that he can hold out any hope of the revision of the whole matter?

MR. RUNCIMAN: It is not for me to make any announcement on the subject. With regard to the balances lying at the Bank of England, I cannot give the figures without notice.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that from time to time enormous sums have been lying in these banks without bearing interest?

MR. RUNCIMAN: The Bank of England is the only bank used, and it is not usual for them to pay interest on balances lying there.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: This subject is of enormous importance, and I must put a Question to the Prime Minister. Apparently the whole finance of the Act of 1903 has broken down. Will he take this Minute into consideration, and see whether it is possible to have an early opportunity for discussing it, as both he and the House will see how impossible and inconvenient it is for us to attempt to discuss it by Question and Answer?

CAPTAIN CRAIG: Arising out of the first part of the Answer referring to the £450,000, may I ask whether it is not a fact that several millions of land is so far forward in the matter of sale that there is no necessity for a balance of this kind?

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): May I ask when it is proposed to make a further issue of land stock, and what will be the amount?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): We entirely recognise the great importance of this Minute, and if any special negotiation is required to secure a special opportunity of discussing it, we will be ready to enter into that negotiation, but I should think one of the Votes of the Estimates would afford an opportunity.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will try and arrange that one of the first days possible should be allotted to Irish Estimates, so that we may raise the question soon.

MR. MORTON (Sutherland): Is it not a fact that interest can be got from the Bank of England on balances?

Irish Post Office and Guaranteed Land Stock Transactions.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.): On behalf of the hon. Member for North Fermanagh, I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether any regulations have been made to enable persons desirous of taking advantage of Section 2 of the Land Purchase (Ireland) Act, 1891, to do so by purchase and transfer of Guaranteed Land Stock through the Post Office; if not, will he give the matter his early attention, and will he see that the regulations are duly published at post offices, such as Boyle and Castlerea, county Roscommon, and others, where there are many persons who could usefully avail themselves of the advantages of Section 2.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: No regulations have been made by the Treasury under the Section mentioned by the hon. Member, but I understand that they are communicating with the various Departments concerned in order to ascertain whether, having regard to the manner in which the stock is held and to the fact that it is not freely purchasable any regulations for transfer could be usefully made.

The Committee of Defence.

VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH: I beg to ask the Prime Minister what was the actual expenditure incurred in connection with the visit to the Mediterranean stations by the Committee appointed by the Secretary of State for War, in conjunction with the Admiralty, for that purpose; and upon what Estimates presented to Parliament has such expenditure been charged.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: As the journey of this Committee was not confined to the Mediterranean it would be difficult to ascertain the exact proportion of the cost incurred in connection with their visit to the Mediterranean. The expenditure for the whole inquiry amounted to £907 9s. 11d. Of this sum the payments for services of members of the Committee were charged to Army Vote 12, Item H; the Admiralty's messing bill to Vote 6 F.3, and the travelling expenses to Vote 6 E.2. No additional expenditure for coal or stores was involved.

Scottish Supply.

Mr. MORTON: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether he will arrange to allow at least two full sittings for the discussion of the Scottish Estimates.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Owing to the time which will have to be given to the Scottish Land Bill, I doubt if it will be possible to give two days to the Estimates.

Trawling in the Moray Firth.

Mr. RAMSAY MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to the illegal trawling going on in the Moray Firth which has led to the prosecution and punishment of British fishermen; whether the boats thus engaged are British-owned boats that have been placed under a foreign flag solely for the purpose of being better able to prosecute trawling that has been held in the British courts to be illegal, and that the owners of these trawlers are engaging crews to break the law by serving on these trawlers, and in the knowledge that these men are liable to fine and imprisonment in consequence of fulfilling their labour contracts; and whether, in view of these things, he proposes to introduce legislation which will enable the courts to punish the Hull and Grimsby capitalists who are the real offenders, and who pocket the profits derived from the illegal employment of these crews, and also to forfeit those British-owned trawlers which have been placed under a foreign flag in order that they may be protected whilst breaking the British law.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: My attention has been called to the matter referred to by my hon. friend. The facts as stated may be taken as generally correct. I am, however, unable to undertake to introduce legislation on the lines proposed in the Question.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is not the fact that the boats mentioned in the Question are properly registered in Norway, and are entirely amenable to the Norwegian law?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not aware, but my impression is that the facts are as stated in the Question.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman have full inquiry made as to whether there is any truth at all in the suggestions contained in this Question?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know that any inquiry is necessary. I imagine that the facts are not disputed.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman in favour of Englishmen being allowed the same privileges as foreigners?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am in favour of all Englishmen who break the laws of their country—which in this case is Scotland (laughter)—or rather a Scottish law being held liable for it, and I should be glad to see those who provoke them to do it also made liable.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to make the law applicable to foreigners as well?

Colonial Conference.

Mr. HUNT: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether, except in matters of defence, the Press may be furnished every day with a report of the proceedings and debates of the present Conference, in order that the people of the Empire may know what is going on from day to day.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is entirely for the Conference itself to decide how far it will give publicity to its proceedings; and the existing arrangement of issuing on each day of meeting a brief statement of what has passed was settled by it at the outset. The question as to complete publication of proceedings will be considered later.

Mr. HUNT: May I ask if the Colonial Premiers object to the debates on Preferential Imperial Trade being reported fully, and, if not, what did Lord Elgin mean by saying——

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! Notice should be given of that Question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) said he understood that the remaining portion of the debate on the Army Bill would finish by Tuesday night, that the Government would proceed with the Budget resolutions on Wednesday, and he supposed they would take Supply on Thursday. He would be glad to know what Supply it was proposed to take.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said the Navy Estimates would be taken first; then, if occasion admitted, the Board of Agriculture.

A PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLEMENT EDWARDS (Denbigh District) said that a few days ago he was allowed as a matter of personal explanation to call attention to a speech delivered in his constitutency by the hon. and junior Member for Merthyr Tydvil.† In view of what happened on that occasion and what had since happened it was, he thought, proper that he should read a communication which he received on Saturday from the hon. and junior Member for Merthyr Tydvil. It was as follows:—

"Dear Edwards,

"Now that the Wrexham incident stands out in its true perspective, I feel that I have neither been just to you nor to myself in my handling of it. When your letter came charging me with abusing my position in having gone into your constituency and wilfully lied about you—for that is how I read it—my first impulse was to toss the thing into the fire and take no notice. You see, I was thinking of myself and my innocence of the charge, and did not at the moment realise your point of view. What I had in my mind at Wrexham when your name was mentioned, and what I still continue to believe I said, was that your expenses were paid by your Party. Be this, however, as it may, my object in now writing is to express my regret that any words of mine should have given you offence; and to apologise for any looseness of speech which may have been capable of being interpreted to mean that you in any way accepted money for services rendered to your Party. This is hurriedly written under difficulties, and you are at full liberty to use it in any way you think fit.

"Yours faithfully,

"J. Keir Hardie."

He quite frankly accepted this withdrawal, and so far as he was concerned, the incident was now at an end.

INCOME TAX.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Income Tax shall be charged for the year beginning the sixth day of April, nineteen hundred and seven, at the rate of one shilling in the pound."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.): It was agreed on Thursday last when we closed the debate that we should have an opportunity to-day on this the first of the Resolutions proposed at this sitting to continue the general examination of the Budget proposals with the advantage of the reflection allowed in the interval. I confess that the results of that reflection are not altogether comforting. I said, as a first impression after the Chancellor of the Exchequer's very interesting speech, that it seemed to me that this Budget was in some respects a disquieting Budget. Further reflection only confirms me in that view; I think it is not merely a disquieting Budget, it is an ominous Budget. What is the position which the Chancellor of the Exchequer's financial statement has disclosed? He congratulates the House and the country upon a year of exceptional trade prosperity, and it follows upon a year of the same character. Yet we find there is not that expansion in the yield of our taxes which everyone would have wished to find, and which, I think, most people would have expected to find, given the premisses described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman, with a very considerable surplus in his hands this year, and an anticipation—I think a justifiable anticipation—of a considerably larger surplus next year, is unable to give any remission of taxation in the current year. Further, having regard to the state of the finances, the limits he himself has placed on his activity as Finance Minister, and the demands which are made as to social reform, he cannot hold out any hope of a reduction of taxation next year. Am I not right in saying that is an ominous statement? The Chancellor of the Exchequer says he cannot deal with the surplus in such a way as to involve any permanent diminution of revenue on a considerable scale. Accordingly now, for the first time, in piping times of peace, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announces that he looks forward to a permanent income tax of 1s. in the pound.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifeshire, E.): I never said anything of the kind. I said we must regard the income-tax, in my opinion, as a permanent part of our fiscal machinery.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I am referring to one portion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech and he is answering me out of another portion, and I think he may find it hard to reconcile the two. In justifying his income-tax proposals the right hon. Gentleman said we must now regard the income-tax as a permanent part of our taxation. I will comment on that later. But I am now dealing with the statement that, having regard to the demands upon us, he cannot deal with the surplus, large as it appears to be, in such a way as to involve any permanent diminution of revenue. What is that but saying he cannot reduce the taxes from the level at which they stand; that if he has a surplus it is mortgaged, that a larger surplus would still be mortgaged, and that no surplus he can contemplate on the present taxation is sufficient to meet the demands he foresees within the near future? He took credit to himself for not promising old age pensions. I am not aware that anybody ever promised them. Who did? [An HON. MEMBER: "Joe," and cheers.] I suppose hon. Members who cheer mean to say that my right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham did. I challenge them to produce the passage containing that promise; they cannot do it. What my right hon. friend did was to expound to the country a scheme elaborated by a non-Party committee, on a more moderate economical, and prudent basis than any which has been put before the country from any other source, and he said that that was a scheme which was simple and which anyone could understand. He for one was prepared to support a scheme on that basis, and I for another am prepared to support a scheme on that basis now. I see no reason for going back from it in any degree. It is more prudent and wiser finance, more calculated to encourage thrift and promote good conduct among the masses of the people than the non-contributory scheme, to which alone the Chancellor of the Exchequer will lend any countenance. The right hon. Gentleman takes credit to himself for not having promised a scheme. He has gone very near to promising a scheme next year, and all his friends so understand it. Perhaps the Chancellor of the Exchequer will take note of the interpretation placed on his utterance, and if he does not mean to pledge himself to old age pensions next year——

MR. ASQUITH: My words were perfectly free from ambiguity.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I think the right hon. Gentleman's words amount to as good a Parliamentary pledge as I ever heard. It is patent that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has no money to give away, and we have now to contemplate a permanent income-tax of 1s. in the pound. That is a deplorable thing, and I contrast it with the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer twelve months ago. The right hon. Gentleman said he associated himself with the declarations of his predecessors, that an income-tax of a uniform rate of 1s. in the pound——

MR. ASQUITH: A uniform rate.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: That such a tax in a time of peace was impossible to justify and difficult to defend. Let me read on. He said—

> "It is a burden on the trade of the country which in the long run affects not only profits, but wages."

A normal 1s. tax even with an abatement to 9d. on incomes of less than £2,000 a year still is a burden on the trade of the country, which in the long run affects not only profits, but wages. And I go on to quote the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

> "And from the point of view of the nation it is open to the same objection as a continuance at an abnormal figure of the floating debt—namely, that it tends to destroy or at any rate to contract a most readily available reserve on which the State can draw in times of unforeseen emergency."

It is true that the Chancellor of the Exchequer put in that carefully chosen qualification about a "uniform" rate of 1s., but these objections are wider and are not affected by the qualification. They apply to any income-tax the normal rate of which is as high as 1s. I venture to express a personal opinion that of all the taxes which affect the wages fund, which affect the amount of capital available for investment, and therefore react directly upon the amount of employment for the people of this country, there are none which bear with such serious weight as the income-tax. By indirect taxation you may raise what a man pays on wine, cigars, or other luxuries, and if he has not a sufficient margin of income he will reduce his expenditure proportionately, and he will continue to lay by as before; but when you come to the income-tax and tax his savings, then I think you directly deter him from increasing those savings, and he is apt to regard that as something beyond his control, and accordingly, instead of spending less, he spends what he did before; he pays the additional income-tax, and the amount he has available for investment, for the extension indirectly of employment, and for the promotion of wage-earning industries is thereby lessened. An even more serious objection is the objection taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year that the income-tax is our great reserve for any emergency. Why is that so? It is because as a financial engine it is the one which you can work faster or slower, of which you can alter the speed or intensity with less disturbance to trade than any other tax—not only than any direct tax, but any indirect. The income-tax stands almost alone among our direct taxes as the great engine which the Chancellor of the Exchequer can employ to meet a temporary emergency; and I say the trifling abatement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given on incomes of less than £2,000 a year is altogether insufficient to relieve the strain which the income-tax payer suffers under, or to restore to the tax that elasticity for purposes of emergency which every financier desires to see. And that is not the whole matter. It is not only the income-tax payer for whom the Chancellor's statement is full of meaning, and, as our neighbours across the Channel say, gives furiously to think. The working classes as well as the direct taxpayer must be content to pay as before. Is the last general election already so far behind us that Members have forgotten the piteous cry put up on behalf of the consumer from a hundred Liberalplatforms? Here is the Chancellor of the Exchequer of a Radical Government, with a surplus of £3,500,000, and looking forward to a further surplus next year, telling the consumer that he must continue to "pay, pay, pay." Whilst I share to the full the desire expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and felt in every quarter, to make some provision for the old age of the deserving poor, I think he is placing an unnecessary burden on the taxpayer, and an unnecessary difficulty in his own way, by the determination he has expressed not to look at any form of contributory scheme. For my part, I think he would be wise not to exclude the possibility of contributory schemes, difficult perhaps to start, but becoming, as I think they would, more popular as their provisions become known, and as the benefit earned under them began to be reaped; and I am certain that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would proceed upon those lines, in the first instance at any rate, he would need to make a smaller draft upon the Exchequer, and would find himself less handicapped than he is by his own declaration. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech shows that we have come very near to the end of our tether on the present basis of taxation. And now comes in the cloven hoof. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says the Party opposite is a free trade Government and a free trade Party. Of course he uses the term free trade in the very restricted and imperfect sense in which we habitually apply it in this country, as meaning a Government which does not hesitate to tax your trade provided it can prove that no British subject derives any benefit from the tax, but which refuses to adopt any fiscal expedient if it could be shown that a British subject might conceivably be benefited thereby. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that that indeed narrows his field, but only in the sense in which a wise builder narrows his field of operations to firm ground and avoids the unfathomable morass. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Hear, hear."] I wonder whether the hon. Gentlemen who cheer that statement really believe that the fiscal system of every country except Turkey and Great Britain is based upon an unfathomable morass—whether they really believe that every one of the great self-governing Colonies, the kindred nations across the seas, whose representatives are now present in our capital, have based their whole system of government on an insecure foundation, and that we, and we alone, with the single exception of His Majesty the Sultan of Turkey, have found the true way?

MR. LYNCH (Yorkshire, W.R., Ripon): I heard protection described by a speaker at a mass meeting of electors during the last Presidential campaign in the United States as a "grand larceny upon the American people."

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I suppose the hon. Member was one of those who contributed cheers to that statement. I was not referring particularly to the hon. Member, but I am delighted to hear him. That really is characteristic of the sort of stuff that did duty on a hundred Liberal platforms. I am not going to turn aside to argue the question fully at the present moment, but I am going to make two observations which are sufficient for my purpose and will show that I do not fear to meet the hon. Gentleman on the issue he has raised. The hon. Member quotes his opinion as if he would have us believe that the American people are willing to abandon their system. Does he suppose that they are?

MR. LYNCH: They would like to abandon it.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: If they wished to abandon it they can do so. ["No, no."] But every man who knows anything about America knows two things about it. First, that the tariff there is protectionist in a sense and with an exaggeration that no living man in this country has ever suggested, and which we who call ourselves tariff reformers, and I among them, never suggested. Secondly, while the American people may desire to modify that tariff in some respects, there is not a sane man in the House or out of it who supposes that either he or I will live to see them abandon the system by which their prosperity has been attained and by which it is maintained. It is really absurd of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to suggest that a system which is practically universal outside this country is based on foundations so insecure that no British Minister would be safe in trusting to build upon them. The right hon. Gentleman said that tariff reform was strangled at the last election by the necessity which followed from it of the taxation of raw material, and it was that necessity which had proved fatal to the movement at the last election.

MR. ASQUITH: What I said was, and what I now repeat is, that the movement was entangled with and strangled by its avowed intention to tax the first necessaries of life, such as meat and corn, and what we demonstrated as its necessary consequence was that if justice was to be done to all parts of the Empire in any fair system of preference the taxation of raw material could not be avoided.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I was, it is true, skipping a portion of the right hon. Gentleman's declaration, and on it I must make a few observations. The observation as to taxation of food needs no demonstration, but only a reminder that the Party opposite will have to continue to be food-taxers unless they are false to every promise and pledge of social reform they have given—not only food-taxers on the present basis, but some of them are beginning to ask whether they will not have to increase that basis in order to provide a satisfactory system of old age pensions. Then as to raw material, I am amazed that a man of the general capability, candour, and fairness of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with such a clear perception of the question, should repeat in the House, after plenty of time for reflection, the fable which he industriously circulated on public platforms, that we were, now or at any other time, to place a tax on raw materials.

Mr. Austen Chamberlain.

MR. ASQUITH: The right hon. Gentleman made no such proposal. What he has proposed was not the question we had to consider; the question was what would inevitably follow.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: We deny either that we proposed or that we would be obliged to put a tax on raw material. Has the Chancellor of the Exchequer ever studied any foreign tariff? What is the object of the modern German tariff? The object is, not to exclude all goods from the outside, but to make the imports consist as far as possible of those classes of goods which are of the most benefit to the whole community. Germany wishes to do a big foreign trade as well as ourselves, and they desire, as far as the action of the Government can guide and control it, that they should be protected so as to secure that their imports should consist of raw material or of goods on which very little work has been done, and in order that for the masses of their own people they may secure the maximum of employment and industry in their own country. Not only is it not true to say that we shall be forced to tax raw material by any principles we have enunciated, but it would be the very reverse of the principles by which we are guided to do anything of the kind. Why is it that the right hon. Gentleman thinks we should be driven to it? He says that you cannot give a fair system of preference among the Colonies unless you do. That shows the total and unpardonable ignorance of the right hon. Gentleman, after we have discussed the question for two or three years, as to the nature of the preferential arrangements which are now being carried out among the great self-governing Colonies, and in which we are invited to take a mutual part. No one has attempted to show exactly how to adjust their system so that every part of the British Empire to which they accorded preference shall receive exactly the same benefit. That is not the way in which Canada has proceeded. Canada has found certain concessions it can make, and it grants them to any self-governing Colony which will make reasonable concessions to her. She has also introduced a special Empire free list in which certain goods shall be admitted free provided they come from any portion of the British Empire. They offer such preference as they can give to any who come within the scope of it; and so shall we when the time comes. [Cries of "When?"] The man is short-sighted who thinks, because the opinion of the present House of Commons is averse from it, that the opinion of the electors on issues of which this was only one has been recorded in favour of the Government, the question is settled, and who fails to see at this moment that both at home and in the Colonies attention is concentrated upon it as it never was concentrated before, and that the question is likely to be an abiding question until we are able to settle it in this country in harmony with the general feeling of our race throughout the world. When that time comes the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day will be free from many difficulties which beset the right hon. Gentleman owing to the restrictions by which he has needlessly bound his hands. He will then be able to raise some portion of his revenue from the foreigners who use and take advantage of our markets, and instead of imposing taxation on articles of general consumption he will be able to raise a portion of it from articles of luxury, such as motor-cars, which may well contribute to our revenue. When those days come I cannot say what the demands of the public purse will be, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that time will be better equipped to meet them than is the right hon. Gentleman with all the abounding prosperity on which he congratulates us, and with the surplus of which he boasts. The right hon. Gentleman said that the income-tax may now be regarded as a permanent part of our fiscal system. I agree. Then the right hon. Gentleman said that we must deal with the anomalies in that tax which previous Chancellors of the Exchequer have justified themselves for disregarding on the ground that the tax was temporary. I am not aware, since Mr. Gladstone proposed in 1874 to abolish the income-tax, that any Chancellor of the Exchequer or any responsible politician ever thought it to be possible to abolish it altogether. It has been permanent since the decision of the country in 1874. The objection is not that the tax is permanent, but that it is permanent at a high rate, and all the right hon. Gentleman's predecessors, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Lowe, Lord Goschen, Sir M. Hicks Beach, and Sir Stafford Northcote, were of opinion that the real way to remove the intolerable hardship from the tax and to reduce its anomalies was not by attempting differentiation or graduation, but by restoring the income-tax to a low level. I deeply regret, after all the sacrifices which the income-taxpayers have been called upon to bear—including the sacrifice which I myself as Chancellor of the Exchequer was bound to impose upon them—the present Chancellor of the Exchequer should tell them, although he has a surplus, that there can be no kind of general relief. That is not bad news for the income-taxpayer only. It may be bad news for the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If you announce to the income-tax-payer, and especially to the large income-tax-payer, that you are going to keep the income-tax permanently at a 1s. in the pound——

MR. ASQUITH: I have not done so.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Well, if you draw such a picture of your financial future, the demands you have to meet, and the limitations which you have placed upon your power of raising revenue, the income-tax-payer need not be very clever to draw that inference, and I am afraid the result of your announcement will be the withdrawal of income from the area of taxation. Bear in mind, also, that if you induce people to withdraw part of their income or capital from the scope of the tax, it is not the poor man that will profit, but the rich man. I find that in the year 1904–5 the income derived in this country from foreign sources amounted to no less than £66,000,000. It would be no exaggeration to say that probably half of that amount could be withdrawn from the purview of the income-tax if the owners thought it worth while to do so. Undoubtedly there will be a tendency under a permanent high tax, first to divert capital abroad, and, secondly, to keep the interest on that capital abroad instead of bringing it home. Indeed, I do not think it is at all unlikely that before many years have passed the revenue will suffer to the extent of £1,000,000, £1,500,000, or even more per annum, from a movement of this kind. There is another point. The right hon. Gentleman, under cover of giving relief to a single class of income-tax-payer, is going to make the tax more inquisitorial all round. He is going to require from all employers a return of their employees with their rates of salary or wages.

MR. ASQUITH: Lord Ritchie's recommendations.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Very possibly it is right. Hitherto small incomes a little above the limit of exemption, paid in the form of weekly wages, have practically been exempt, not by law, but because the revenue authorities were unable to trace them. Now, at the moment that you are boasting of relieving the burden on small payers of income-tax, you are going to tax a vast body of workmen and clerks earning small salaries weekly, who have hitherto escaped.

MR. ASQUITH: Will the right hon. Gentleman say that they ought to escape?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I do not complain in the least of the interruption, but I say you are going to tax thousands who were not taxed before. Who are these people? They are people in fluctuating or uncertain employment. My answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question is that I think in applying to these people the income-tax in its full force, as it is applied to others, you are dealing out very hard measure to them, because of the very uncertain tenure of their employment and of the wages which they earn. It has been the practice till now to confine the income-tax to people whose appointment is by the year, and who, therefore, had a certain prospect before them. Now you are going to collect the tax from persons whose employment may be terminated at a week's or a day's notice. The precariousness of the employment is a good reason for the distinction; and I think the right hon. Gentleman is ill-advised, in the interest of the tax, in endeavouring to drag this class into his net. In fact, there is no remission of taxation; there is only a shifting of the burden. Is the right hon. Gentleman sure that it is any fairer? In regard to differentiation, he has shifted his ground from permanent and precarious to earned and unearned income. How does he justify his differentiation between earned and unearned? The right hon. Gentleman says that it is anomalous that A, who has £1,000 a year from Consols, and B, who earns £1,000 a year in a profession, should be taxed alike, because while A can spend the whole of his income, knowing that, should he die, his widow and children will still have £1,000 a year, B must put aside something to make a provision in the event of his death for his widow and children. That, surely, is based on the difference, not between earned and unearned, but between permanent and precarious. The moment the right hon. Gentleman puts his proposal on that ground he is bound to treat the income, not from the point of view whether it is due to personal exertion or not, but from the point of view whether the temporary possessor of it has the permanent disposal of it. Take the case of pensions. Is there anything more decidedly earned income than a pension, whether you look upon it as deferred pay or as an enforced provision for old age? A civil servant serves you during thirty or forty of the best years of his life, and you pay him a salary which may be more than adequate if he is a third-rate man, but below his value if he is a first-rate man; and, though I know from personal experience these men receive constantly the most tempting offers from the City or elsewhere, they prefer, quite apart from the honour of serving the State and the Crown, to remain in the service of the State because of the pension, which is part of the condition of their service. How can any Chancellor of the Exchequer for one moment say, differentiating between earned and unearned incomes, that a pension earned by forty years of service is unearned income? How can any Chancellor of the Exchequer for one moment say that it is right to differentiate between earned and unearned incomes and say that a pension earned by forty years' service is unearned income? There is no answer to that. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's answer was that he had an open mind. I think he said that after the discussion the other evening, and after observations such as I am now making, but I think in matters of this importance so intimately associated with the merit of the change, the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to have an answer of his own, at any rate a suggestion, to make at a very early stage, and before we part with this Resolution I think we ought to be told what are his general intentions in regard to these different questions. Take every kind of money charge, life annuities, younger sons' portions or a widow's endowment charge upon an estate. How will the Chancellor of the Exchequer apply his principle in those cases? Say an individual has £1,000 a year for life from any of those sources. Is he in the same position as the man who has £1,000 a year in Consols? No, Sir. Can he, in the first place, spend as freely from that thousand as the owner of Consols, if he has to put aside part of that income every year in order to provide for those who come after him because his income ceases with his life? The Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot draw the line which I understand he is trying to draw, without inflicting far greater hardship and creating far greater anomalies than any which exists under present arrangements. There is another class of income which has not been mentioned in our debates hitherto. How does he propose to treat incomes from patent rights? I make an invention, I patent it, and I am fortunate enough, we will assume, to have got hold of a really valuable commercial idea. I am offered £20,000 down for it, but I prefer to take royalties. When I take royalties, will the right hon. Gentleman treat my royalty as earned or unearned income? It is an annuity for fourteen years, during which period the patent will run. There is no fresh exertion on my part, there is one act of earning and one only, that of invention. How is the Chancellor of the Exchequer going to treat it, how is he going to treat my remuneration? Will he treat it differently whether I take it in annual payments as royalties or in a lump sum down? The moment you try to find an answer to this question you see how complicated and difficult is the distinction which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is trying to draw. If you treat it as earned during the fourteen years the patent has to run, will you give the same treatment to every wasting investment? You must give the same treatment to copyright, and to wasting assets in industrial concerns. If you treat the annual payment as earned you cannot logically deny the same treatment to the man who, instead of taking the annual payment, takes the lump sum and invests it. You can make a distinction between temporary and permanent income; but if you try to make a distinction between the two cases of earned and unearned income, you find you cannot do anything of the kind. Then again, what about leasehold? How does the right hon. Gentleman intend to treat incomes from investments in leasehold properties? It is a very common form of investment with people of very moderate means. What is he going to do with incomes from that source? If the Chancellor of the Exchequer justifies the distinction he has made, he must include all incomes from wasting securities like leasehold properties. I repeat my question, how is the right hon. Gentleman going to treat a landowner who manages his own estate, but does not farm it? Every morning my table is covered with letters from people who will have hard cases created by the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They ask me to ventilate their grievances or they come to me for sympathy which I attempt to give them. I have two cases here, one is that of a gentleman who writes to say that two years ago he gave up a salaried position in order to devote himself to the management of the estate which he owns, with a gross rental of a little over £1,000 a year. Supposing that man was earning £1,000 a year on somebody else's estate the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take from him an income-tax of 9d.; how is he going to treat him when he earns £1,000 from his own estate? [Laughter.] I really do not follow the reason for that laughter, and perhaps the hon. Member opposite will tell me how my question is ridiculous.

Sir T. P. WHITAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley): The difference between the man who earns an income of £1,000 by rendering service, and the man who derives £1,000 from an estate which he manages is surely very evident. The one man is earning £1,000, the other is collecting income and the cost of doing it might be 2½ or 5 per cent.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I have given more than one answer to the hon. Gentleman. I really want the Committee to take this case fairly into consideration. I put the case of a man who, being a land agent, earns his £1,000 a year in that capacity. He then inherits an estate, and having been trained as an estate agent, he proposes to manage his own estate and not to employ anybody to do it for him. In order to do that he has to give up a salaried position which he has occupied, and where he was taxed at 9d. I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he is going to tax him when, instead of earning £1,000 for managing somebody else's estate, he earns £1,000 for managing his own? The hon. Member who interrupted implies that it would be equitable to tax him the full 1s. in the one case and 9d. in the other. The owner who manages his own estate fills the position of factor, agent, master of works, or estate manager, and if he, by managing his estate, earns £1,000 he does so by just as great personal exertion as many a shopkeeper or many a manufacturer, who makes a much greater income. How are you going to draw any distinction in equity between the two cases? Here is another case. A man writes to me and says that he is the owner of small property in town. He tells me that for his net income of nearly £2,000 a year he has to to collect rents of very nearly £4,000 a year gross. He has to go round to collect rents and interview tenants, giving up to the work five or six days a week in order to manage this small house property estate. How are you going to treat him? The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his reply the other day said that in such a case it would be for the individual to prove that the income arose from personal exertion. The Committee I hope, will not allow the measure to pass in that form, it would be grossly uujust. It would mean that it would leave to any Income-tax Commissioners or Board of Inland Revenue a width of discretion that would enable them to enforce an entirely different law in one part of the country from that prevailing in another, and an entirely different law in one class of circumstances from that prevailing in another, and I think that the Committee must decide what is fair and equitable in these circumstances. I do not want to weary the Committee with more detailed cases. I will make one general observation. Of course the right hon. Gentleman's £2,000 limit is wholly illogical, it is a matter of convenience on general grounds, and he is entitled to say that any man who has £2,000 a year does not need consideration, but on every ground of equity and logic, if the distinction between earned and unearned income is to be maintained I must enter my most serious protest against a proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which, while nominally making a concession, withdraws about one-half of it with the other hand. He says that where a man has an income of less than £700, he is entitled to abatement upon that, and that the abatement will be taken from the earned portion of his income. I will take the position of a person with a small income of £300 a year, one of the people whom the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members opposite desire to help. Suppose, as one of my correspondents says, £150 is derived from investments and £150 is annual salary. He is entitled to an abatement of £160 because his whole income does not exceed £300. You take the abatement off his earned portion and accordingly you deprive him of any benefit whatever under the concession which the right hon. Gentleman nominally makes to people with small earned incomes. There are not many cases so neat as that which I have just described, but there are a vast number of people who will be affected in that way, and who, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer persists for reasons of administrative convenience in taking the abatement off the earned portion of the income, will be deprived of any benefit from the Chancellor of the Exchequer's change, although they are the very class of people whom he wishes most to benefit. Then there is another question which is familiar to the House and which becomes of increasing importance as the Chancellor of the Exchequer modifies the incidence of the tax. Why are husband and wife to have their income lumped together for the purpose of income-tax? In the case of a husband with a very large income and a wife with a small income it may seem rather absurd to allow her an abatement when she enjoys the benefit of the husband's large income; but when you legislate to provide for that case you legislate for a bad case in such a way as to make bad law. For one case of that kind there are a thousand cases of the other kind, where you get a working man and working woman who up to the moment they marry are exempt from income-tax, and when they marry and are fulfilling the duties of good citizens, contributing, we may hope, to the strength and security of the State, you strike at them for the first time through the income-tax. The hardship became greater as abatement became a more important and permanent part of the system, and now, when, in addition to the abatement, you undertake to make a differentiation, it is a gross injustice to lump two small incomes together and treat them as one for the purpose of income-tax. I have said enough to show how difficult is the task on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has entered. I have heard his Budget described by a not unfriendly critic of his as a humdrum Budget. I have ventured to reply that no Budget is humdrum which attempts to differentiate between incomes derived from different sources. It is not what you would call a typical Radical Budget. It is a scheme intimately associated with the proposals of an hon. friend lately a Member of this side of the House, now temporarily excluded, Sir George Bartley, who year after year pressed them on successive Chancellors of the Exchequer, as Mr. Hubbard had done before him. It is not a Radical proposition; but it is a proposition which enormously complicates the tax. It not merely increases the complexity of your machinery, but it introduces a whole series of complicated problems which it is evident the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not attempted to solve, has not yet solved, is not yet willing to tell us how he proposes to solve.

Mr. ASQUITH: Why do you say that?

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Because you said you were waiting till the close of this evening's debate before deciding.

Mr. ASQUITH was understood to say he had decided.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has got a decision in his mind. The Committee is entitled to have that decision announced to it at the earliest moment. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer knows how he is going to treat these different classes of property, and has a reasoned policy in regard to these points, surely we are entitled to know what that policy is without any further delay. I apologise to the Committee and thank them for their indulgence. These are matters in which I naturally take a very great interest. I looked carefully into the question of differentiation with no unsympathetic eye when Chancellor of the Exchequer; but, like so many of my predecessors, I abandoned it, not because I thought it in theory unjust, but because I thought it impossible to arrive at a practical working decision which would be fair as between party and party, and do what it was its object to achieve. What I concluded and what I now hold is that the only true remedy for all the anomalies and grievances of the income-tax is to get it back to a low figure and keep it at that low figure.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of EDUCATION (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.): The right hon. Gentleman has just made an interesting speech, and I do not think there will be any complaint on this side of the House as to the manner in which he has attempted to criticise the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But I do not think the complaint he makes is quite justified. He complains that our income-tax proposal will involve very great difficulties. Surely the right hon. Gentleman is aware that difficulties are inherent in the income-tax law and they exist to-day. The right hon. Gentleman's latest difficulty is that of husband and wife, but the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer when he was in office had that difficulty pressed upon him with great force by the hon. Member for Hammersmith, and of course he must be fairly familiar with it. That difficulty is not now increased. On the contrary, to a certain extent that difficulty will in the future be reduced, because if the joint income of husband and wife is less than £2,000 a year it will only be taxed as earned income to the extent of 9d. in the pound instead of 1s. As the right hon. Gentleman has not thought fit himself to remove the difficulty, he is no doubt familiar with the argument in defence of the present law on that point. He has asked about certain very minor matters. The right hon. Gentleman desires to know how the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to deal with the inventor who is receiving a royalty for his invention. The form in which the inventor receives payment is a deferred payment on sale. If he were paid so much money down for his invention he would naturally have to pay 1s. in the pound, because his invention would represent property and it would come under the property tax. For work done and paid for within the year a man with an income of less than £2,000 a year would have to pay 9d. in the pound. When income is derived from accumulated property, and not from something on which a man is working at the time, he pays on the property rate. The principle is perfectly clear. I do not think there will be much difficulty in dealing with royalties upon the same basis.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what he means by the same basis? Does he mean 1s. or 9d.?

MR. McKENNA: I mean 1s. in the pound. The right hon. Gentleman asks a question about the landlord working his own estate. The landowner is now dealt with under two schedules. Under Schedule A he pays 1s. in the pound, and he will continue under our new proposal to pay that amount. As a farmer the landlord although working his own property would pay under Schedule B, and he will continue to pay under that schedule, and if his total income is less than £2,000 a year he will pay 9d. in the pound. There is really no inherent difficulty in these cases, and they have to be treated as a matter of principle, and when that is done the difficulties will in practice disappear. The principle upon which the right hon. Gentleman has proceeded is to apportion the burden of the income-tax according to the ability to pay. Of course the exact proportion cannot be discovered by any Chancellor of the Exchequer, but what he says is that the present method of calculating the income-tax departs widely from that principle. It is said that income may be precarious whether derived from investment or from work. But under the present law precarious income in either case is treated alike. Although it may not be possible to distinguish between certain income from investment and precarious income from investment, we can at any rate distinguish the precarious incomes from work; and why should we be precluded from making a reduction in favour of the form of precarious income that is derived from work simply because it is impossible to distinguish between the certain income derived from investment in the funds and the less certain income derived from investment in a railway? There is this great distinction between the two classes of income—the man who is deriving his income from investment has not got to work for it, and the energy of his mind and hands can be devoted to some other form of exertion. If a man is deriving his income from funds or from railway companies so long as he derives it in that way he has got to pay 1s. in the pound. The man engaged in industry whether he labours with his hands or his mind is absorbing all his powers in earning and his income is specially precarious and he must take special pains to provide for his own future and that of his family. The ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer goes on to say that the true remedy is to reduce the amount of the tax. I could not help remembering when I listened to that statement that the last Chancellor of the Exchequer to increase the income-tax was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire himself. I agree with him that all taxation is disagreeable, and if the business of the nation could be conducted without an income-tax I am sure we should all be pleased to get rid of it. But the income-tax is necessary, and to argue that the best way to get rid of these anomalies is to reduce the tax when for the purposes of the year it is necessary to continue it, is asking the House to agree to a mere idle proposition and one which does not assist us in the discussion of this problem. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that if you left the tax at a shilling there would be danger of evasion. What is the experience on that point? There might be danger if the income-tax payers thought that they were being unjustly treated. I am certainly one of those who think that if you suddenly impose a very high rate of tax on a very limited class of persons that limited class would do the utmost in their power to evade the tax, but experience is altogether against the view that persons in this country would attempt to evade a tax of a shilling. The product of the tax is higher now than it has ever been before. The product of the tax was not reduced when the tax was increased to 1s. 3d. There is in this country no sense of unfairness with regard to the income-tax. Persons who have to pay it may grumble, but I have seen no criticism of the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which suggests that it is unfair to reduce the rate of tax on those who have incomes of less than £2,000 a year which are obtained from work. He said that the amount of £2,000 might be increased. I have seen criticisms of that kind, but no criticism to the effect that rich persons would consider that they are treated unfairly by the reduction now made. When the right hon. Gentleman talks about capital, on account of an income-tax of a shilling, being transferred from this to other countries, I would ask him to name the other countries to which capital is to be transferred. If he looks across the Channel he will find that in France dividends are taxed not at 1s., but at 2s. in the £. If he turns to any country where there is a field for investment, he will find that the burden of taxation is at least as heavy as it is in this country, and so far as I can learn, instead of capital being removed from here and transferred abroad, the whole experience is exactly to the contrary. Foreigners invest money far more readily here than in their own countries. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the income-tax as a reserve for emergencies. I do not think he has fairly considered the present proposals as they affect the income-tax from that point of view. The income-tax, after all, is only at a shilling. In recent years it has been at 1s. 3d. in an emergency, and during wars previous to the last it has been at 2s. It cannot be held that a shilling represents the emergency limit. If it were increased to 2s., we should be able to derive an income of over £30,000,000—a provision for war far greater than any provision the country made during the course of the last war. How do the present proposals affect the income-tax as a reserve for emergency? What is the great resistance to an increase of the income-tax? The great resistance arises from those persons who are earning a difficult livelihood and who have to make provision for their wives and families and for their own old age. It is from the very persons who are now relieved by the reduction from 1s. to 9d. that the great resistance arises. The income-tax is now divided into two categories. There is the income-tax which may be described as a tax on property which is collected at the source. Then there is the portion which in the main falls under Schedule D—the income-tax which is difficult to collect and to increase. The division between the two categories renders the income-tax far more elastic than before, and when emergency requires the shilling could be increased to 1s. 3d., 1s. 6d., or 2s., as in our past history. There would be far less difficulty now than in the past when there was a uniform rate. The right hon. Gentleman complained that the Chancellor of the Exchequer contemplated no reduction in taxation generally. What are the facts as to the financial conduct of affairs during the last two years compared with the preceding two years when the right hon. Gentleman was himself a member of the Government in power? What has my right hon. friend done already? The coal tax has been abolished—a tax on industry. A reduction has been made in the tea tax. There has been a larger provision made for the repayment of Debt than ever before in the history of the country. More than that, he has taken on himself on the annual Estimates a charge which hitherto has been met out of loans, and he is now paying off, of the loans raised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, on the Estimates, no less than £2,000,000 a year, in addition to the Sinking Fund of the National Debt. My right hon. friend has now reduced the income-tax where it fell most heavily. He has really in fact from the right hon. Gentleman's point of view acted at once in the most conservative manner, in restoring the credit of the country, and in repaying the Debt for which the right hon. Gentleman and his Party were responsible. He has at the same time reduced taxation in the manner I have described, and he has made definite provision for a social reform which was promised by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, but which was always refused on the ground that there was no money to meet it. What more could the Chancellor of the Exchequer do in two years? Is it reasonable to complain that he does not make any further reduction in taxation which the country at this moment can very well afford to bear. You cannot have it both ways. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has his remedy. He says: "Widen the basis of taxation, and then you will be able to reduce taxation and find room for your other reforms." I can only say that it is somewhat late in the day for the right hon. Gentleman to come forward with any such proposal. He charges my right hon. friend with total and unpardonable ignorance of scientific tariffs. I must confess that I share that ignorance. Some years ago there was started with great pomp and ceremony a Commission which was to instruct us in the nature of scientific taxation. That Commission has held innumerable meetings. It has had many distinguished and experienced persons on its body. It has issued various Reports on various subjects, but not one word has it said on scientific tariffs. The whole object with which that Commission was appointed has failed, and we are still waiting for a scientific tariff. I am in total ignorance of what the right hon. Gentleman means by a scientific tariff as applied to this country. I know what he means as applied to Germany, but would the right hon. Gentleman translate the German tariff into the system of this country? If ignorance on this subject is unpardonable, it is not we who have to seek pardon. It is the Tariff Commission which has refused to enlighten us. I think I am justified in saying that the right hon. Gentleman makes a fundamental error when he argues about this country from the experience of other countries. I, for one, frankly state that I consider that other countries are mistaken in establishing their fiscal policy on a protective basis, but that is not the question for us to consider. What we have to consider is not what is done in Germany or the Colonies, but what is good for this country. The right hon. Gentleman has not made any suggestion as to what he considered would be a right tariff for us to adopt here. Whether in view of a protective policy, or a policy of Colonial preference, the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman are purely fanciful. They have no basis either on experience or on any plan we can understand. What we have to go by in considering the right hon. Gentleman's proposal in the light of his speech, is the system we had under the right hon. Gentleman when Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the definite changes proposed to be made in that system now. I think I have said enough to show that the fears expressed with regard to the reduction of the income tax in certain cases from 1s. to 9d. are quite unjustified, and to dispose of the suggestions—for they were nothing more—that all that has been proposed by my right hon. friend, and far more, could be met by a protective tariff, the details of which have never been stated to us.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) said that in order that the debate might not be too long it would be necessary for every Member who spoke to confine himself to some particular portion of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He would not attempt to traverse the arguments of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. His purpose in rising was to put some questions to the Government and to examine the Budget from the point of view of the future finance of the country. His right hon. friend the President of the Board of Education had declared that the principle of the Government was the distribution of the burden between the taxpayers according to ability to pay. The general canon of ability to pay was applied to the income-tax in particular. The desire of himself and some of his friends was to make their position clear so far as the future was concerned as to the extent to which the Budget was based, or was likely to be based next year on the principle of ability to pay. There was no relief within this Budget, some of them thought, where relief might have been given. It had been shown to demonstration that there was over-taxation of those who were least able to pay, such as the agricultural labourers, as well as an insufficient weight of taxation thrown on those whose ability to pay was greatest. The right hon. Gentleman pointed, very justly, to the continued elasticity of the income-tax, to the increased utility of the income-tax as a war tax, as against the plans of the other side. The Report of the Committee had shown that they would be able at a time when they had public opinion behind them to raise money by a heavily graduated tax. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer had made the basis of his speech one which was likely to turn up in their debates all through the discussions on this Budget. When the Liberal Party wanted to have debates on tariff reform at a time when they might have been useful for the enlightenment of the country they never could get them. It would be a pity now to waste all their time with sterile discussions of tariff reform when they might be discussing the Budget proposals. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to base his view on a greater productiveness of our fiscal system which would enable us to have a low income-tax, and to tax the foreigner. But let them take the nearest protectionist countries—France and Prussia. France raised a larger proportion of her revenue from direct taxation than Great Britain did; and other taxes in the nature of an income-tax which French statesmen were now trying to raise were much heavier than ours. In Prussia they had a 2s. income-tax—1s. for Imperial purposes, and 1s. for local purposes. But it would be found that the adoption of such tariffs as theirs did not reduce their contributions to the income-tax. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer made another remark which was directed against the Budget as a whole for this year and that for next year, to which he wished to make an allusion before he came to the present Budget itself. They all on the Ministerial side of the House rejected the view that in dealing with old age pensions the Government should adopt the plan recommended by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. They thought that the arguments adduced against the thrift and contributory plan were overwhelming. On the other hand that rejection was important, because of the great expense involved by it. He himself would offer the most uncompromising resistance to a scheme of old age pensions based on thrift and contributions, and would fight it to the death, because it would be monstrously unjust against the poorer classes of men and women workers. That was a remark by the way; but he wished to put it on record in view of what might take place next year. He did not want to deal with the Budget as a whole; but one remark he wished to make arose out of what he had said as to the equality of contribution. He thought that those who contributed the most according to their means, the agricultural labourers, did not receive the relief which they ought to have. His right hon. friend had said that they could not touch the sugar duties this year for reasons which might possibly be misunderstood abroad. He would, therefore, note that he assumed that the Government were going to act on their pledge to denounce the Sugar Convention at the earliest possible moment. But when considering a Budget for two years he was very much afraid that the argument put forward by his right hon. friend might affect his power of dealing with sugar next year. He must enter a caveat against the proposition that the House of Commons was committed to the idea that duties on articles of consumption by the poorer classes and by agricultural labourers were to be continued for all time. They were all delighted that his right hon. friend was going to deal with the intercepted revenue for local taxation. At the same time, he would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman one or two questions. The right hon. Gentleman's argument was that his desire was to free the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and that rather looked as though in any future development of new sources of taxation, these would be treated as Imperial and not as for the benefit of the local authorities.

MR. ASQUITH said that no one was more strongly opposed to that than himself.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that it was assumed by some that, before the matter could be settled, it was necessary to wait until the question of valuation should be dealt with. His own difficulty concerned not valuations but boundaries. If the urban authorities were to be given new sources of taxation the present boundaries could not stand, and, therefore, the control of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or some one representing the whole country would be requisite. It was quite clear that by this Budget they were not committing themselves on that point; and it was to be hoped that new sources of local taxation might be discovered. As the alternative was the use of the income-tax by localities, he pointed out that all other countries were throwing local taxation on the income-tax. In this country they must contemplate a heavy income-tax for local purposes or discover new sources of taxation. He now came to the income-tax in the Budget of this year. His right hon. friend had told the Committee that the Select Committee were unanimously in favour of upholding the necessity of the differentiation he had proposed. That was going rather far, though strictly speaking that was so. Some people came to differentiation as the main thing they wanted; other people who wanted graduation only came very reluctantly to differentiation. He admitted freely that the description that the hon. Member for Spen Valley had given of what had occurred was that the Report of the Select Committee did not accurately represent the opinion of any one Member of the Committee; while the hon. Member for East Edinburgh said that the Report was not logical; it was the result of discordant views, and that that was the reason why it was accepted. That was a little like the case of the Thirty-Nine Articles. It was difficult to say whether the Puritan majority of the House or the Bishops disliked those Articles most in the time of Queen Elizabeth, but they were accepted. Paragraph 13 of the Report of the Select Committee said that it was not desirable that the total revenue to be derived from their income-tax should be less than under existing circumstances, and that the tax should be raised in other directions to compensate for any loss. His right hon. friend was extending the principle of declaration. At the present moment all those with an income below £700 a year, who were in the vast majority, had to make a full declaration in order to get the benefit of the reduction. The right hon. Gentleman called upon others to do that which some did now, which the London newspapers did now, namely, to return the wages of all employeés, yet in some cases they were not to return their own income if it was above £2,000 a year. The recommendations of the Committee were contradictory and were not clear. The words used on two pages of the Report were not the same, and one of those recommendations was carried only by his casting vote. The recommendation of the Committee of 1905–1906 was repeated by the unanimous recommendation of his Committee. That was not enough for many of them. As many as seven voted for the strongest possible reform, so that nearly half were in favour of the fullest possible return for income-tax in the country. Was there anything to be said against that? He admitted it might be difficult to obtain these full and free returns if it was for the purpose of increasing a man's taxation; but for the purpose of obtaining relief these declarations might easily be required. It was suggested that there was evasion at the present time on the part of some of those who returned income under Schedule D, and they felt the effect of those evasions, of which all in their individual capacity were aware. He was not going to allude to the formidable evidence enforcing the necessity for universal declarations which came before his Committee and was not allowed to be published, but let them take the evidence published by the former Committee of 1905–1906. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that if they had a high income-tax or even continued it permanently at a shilling there would be evasion; but was there no evasion now? The Chancellor of the Exchequer put very high the advantage which they obtained by collection at the source, but no one desired to part with collection at the source. It was not necessary for graduation to part with collection at the source. He, for one, only agreed to differentiate, as it was proposed in this year, if it was to be confined to incomes in the lower portion of the scale. The hon. Member for Paddington contended that the death duties ought not to be connected with income-tax, but though there were cases in which they were not connected, there were others where both income-tax and death duties pressed in an equal degree, and there were cases in which they were connected. It had been shown beyond dispute that the power of getting income-tax by death duties was least in the lower scale. There was some ground, therefore, for treating differentially the incomes below £2,000. Many of them had yielded to differentiation below the £2,000, with all its difficulties, and they were great; they had yielded, as they would not yield in the upper portion of the scale, because there graduation and differentiation came into competition; and it was graduation many of them wanted. There had been some attempt to put the individual case, but it was useless to fight long on the individual case, because it was quite possible to find great hardships in individual cases in every tax that had ever been imposed. Up to the present the difficulty had been looked at either from that point of view or from the point of view that there was a risk of creating greater injustice. In 1894 Sir William Harcourt, one of those Chancellors of the Exchequer who always refused to accept differentiation, quoted these words—

> "Unequal measure must be dealt to persons whose circumstances are equal, and equal measure must be dealt to persons whose circumstances are unequal."

They were those of Sir Stafford Northcote, accepted by Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Lowe, who all thought that there was a risk of creating greater injustice than existed at present. There was ground, he thought, for differentiation provided it was understood that differentiation was not to be extended as graduation might be extended, to the upper portion of the scale. Sir H. Primrose yielded to differentiation; he showed conclusively that the machinery of the department did not adapt itself to the distinction based upon the nature of precarious incomes, and therefore if they were to differentiate it must be on the basis which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had adopted and not upon that of the precarious nature of incomes. They should put in some words of caution to prevent differentiation being brought in over £2,000, and to prevent graduation being ruled out, and he desired to make it clear that some of them could only accept differentiation on that principle. The Report of the Committee of 1905 made it clear why some of them denied universal deductions. It said—

> "There are many kinds of income to which this system of assessment at the source can not be applied at all, or can only be very imperfectly applied, as for instance, the profits derived from a private business, the income derived from a profession, and certain descriptions of income derived from abroad. In order to ascertain these incomes the Government has to rely largely upon self-assessment by the taxpayer. Unfortunately, there is abundant evidence to show that in the sphere in which self-assessment is still requisite, there is a substantial amount of fraud and evasion."

What was the evidence of Sir Thomas Hewitt? He was asked whether it would not be an improvement to compel everybody to make a return, and he agreed. He was then asked, "You are of opinion that evasions are extending considerably," and he said, "Yes I know it is so. I can speak absolutely and positively." They must also remember what was said by Sir Felix Schuster, that the belief people had in their minds was that the Government collected everything at the source. That very fact tended to defeat the object of assessment at the source, and to prevent people remembering to make a return in the case where money came to them from abroad. There were many rich people who did not know whether the tax was paid upon such incomes or not, and so easy-going people would fill up nil upon the form without inquiry. Sir T. Hewitt had called attention to the fact that, according to a case which had been decided, the Government had very considerable powers now of forcing people to produce their accounts. They heard a good deal about the inquisitorial character of the tax, but that inquisitorial character was only in order to make all people do what most people did—make a fair and honest return. Those people who did not pay upon a fair and honest return ought to be made to do so, for otherwise the honest people had to pay more. It had been shown that a startling amount of back duty was recovered at the present time, a very small proportion of which was treble duty, but referred almost entirely to evasions under Schedule D. There were, however, other schedules besides Schedule D which were the subject of evasion. Looking at the evidence showing the enormous evasion of the income-tax and the easy way in which people failed to make any return of their dutiable property on the ground that other people did the same, he thought that not too much ought to be made of the boast that virtually the whole of the tax was gathered at the source. Those who had looked into the subject were aware of the enormous amount of property that escaped the payment of income-tax at present, and a great deal of the tax would be gathered if precautions were taken to see that everyone made a declaration of his income from every source. But that end could only be attained by frankly accepting what was called an inquisition as to the amount of income derived from all sources. It had been suggested that graduation, an increase of the death duties, and inquisitorial declarations would result in the flight of capital from this country. To what country was capital to go? The death duties were being increased in Germany and France, and indeed it was a race among foreign Powers as to whose death duties should be placed at the highest point in respect of great properties. But surely it was desirable to consider whether causes other than the amount of the income-tax did not eventually settle the ultimate destination of capital. In Monaco, for example, there was no taxation; in France direct taxation was the highest in the world; but no one had ever detected the flight of anyone to Monaco in order to escape taxation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London) submitted that there had been cases of the flight of capital from France to Switzerland and from France to the United States.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that there was a fashion in these things in France confined for the most part to the idle rich, but not found among the business people. There could hardly be a fear of the income-tax in France, where, by the showing of M. Poincaré, the average income-tax, under other names, was already for national purposes, nearly 8½ per cent. There was a wish to see a heavy income-tax shifted and placed on a reasonable basis; but the moving of capital from France through the fear that another tax would be introduced was not a tenable view. The evidence available, at any rate, did not provide justification for the view of timidity with regard to the shifting of capital from land to land. He admitted that it would be difficult to collect a large amount of money here by means of a graduated super-tax against the will of the trading community, though by means of degression a much larger sum of money might be collected from the income-tax than was now procurable without the fear of causing capital to flow into other countries. The main ground on which he supported the Budget of this year was that it kept the door open, and that not a word had been said which made it difficult in the future to adopt the principle of graduation within the income-tax itself. He hoped that his right hon. friend would see his way to do something to meet the fears that he had expressed as to the future. They could not contemplate even the spending of £20,000,000 on old age pensions if it involved keeping up permanently such enormous indirect taxation as now existed, for example, on the agricultural classes. In addition to the tea duty, there was the sugar duty, which was a very serious hindrance to the industry of the country; and when they looked at the nature of the tobacco duties, how they pressed heavily on the tobacco consumed by the poorest of the poor, and the beer and licensing duties, it was assuredly difficult to justify the permanent retention of indirect taxation on such a scale. In the circumstances of this year his right hon. friend was justified in the course he had taken, but next year he hoped that something might be done to meet the views that he had urged.

*MR. STUART WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) believed the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to a great extent underrated his opportunity, and the resources available to him, for dealing with the sugar duty this year. If he were before them with a clean slate, he would have a surplus, on the basis of existing taxation, of £3,433,000, and if he added the £600,000 increased estate duty he would have £4,033,000. Taking that as his clean slate, and after providing £200,000 for necessitous schools, he calculated that if the right hon. Gentleman made no further proposals, he would this year have a surplus of £4,583,000, and next year of £5,183,000. These figures would enable Mr. Asquith this year to take 2s. 2d. per cwt. off sugar, leaving the tax at 2s., or next year to take off 3s. 2d., and leave the tax at 1s. There was another alternative. It must be borne in mind that sugar was the raw material of important British industries. The right hon. Gentleman might give a rebate on sugar used for the purposes of manufacture, either of confectionery or of mineral waters, or of other commodities. In that way he would give the sugar manufacturers no greater advantage than was now enjoyed by the manufacturers of tobacco in this country, who paid on their raw material a duty of 3s., while the importer of manufactured tobacco had to pay as much as 6s. This concession would enable British manufacturers to supply the consumer at lower prices than if the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a small remission on all imports of sugar. As had been pointed out, the danger was that this Budget was to be connected with a future series of Budgets, and there was a chance that the question of the sugar tax might be altogether drowned out by the magnitude of other questions. The right hon. Gentleman had used two sentences in his speech to which he would draw special attention. The right hon. Gentleman said—and he also said—

> "I cannot part with the one million and a half of money. I shall need the money for the future; I shall need it next year."

It was not out of any absolute unkindness to the right hon. Gentleman or from any malicious intention that he dwelt upon the personal pronoun "I," which was the nominative case of these interesting paragraphs. It was necessary to make this reference in order to remind the Committee of the object in view. It might be perfectly right to aim at continuity in these Budgets, but that did not mean that the right hon. Gentleman had any right to issue promissory notes to embarrass his successors. How did the Chancellor of the Exchequer know that it would be he, or even a colleague of his, that would have to deal next year with the £1,500,000 that he pretended thus to pledge in advance? That observation applied to both the right hon. Gentleman's proposals as to income-tax and old age pensions. For the life of him he could not see why the Chancellor of the Exchequer stopped the differentiation at incomes above £2,000 a year. It might be that the Select Committee had recommended some such limit, but with the utmost respect to that Committee, he could not find that there was anything about it contained in the reference to them. It was really not a question connected with practicability; they did not say it was a question connected with practicability, and the evidence did not show that it was connected with practicability. It was really a question which ought to be settled by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House itself without reference to any Committee. The fundamental distinction was that the capital value of the asset taxed was not the same, and that disparity applied throughout the whole scale. He knew what was in the minds of the Committee, and in the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What weighed upon their minds was the bugbear of the too prosperous brewer, the man who got so rich that they had to disregard the fact that it was by his personal exertions that he was making money. But the mere fact of the brewer's riches was no argument except in the case where the very success which had produced the riches had also, by creating a good-will, given permanency to the income; and, in that case, the claim to differentiation disappeared. The true distinction was not between earned and unearned income, but between temporary and continuing income—continuing, that is, independently of the life of the recipient.. In the case of temporary income, they ought not to stop at £2,000 a year, in giving the advantage of differentiation, because however rich the recipient might be, the income died with him, or ceased when his personal capacity to earn it ceased. Its permanency should not depend upon its magnitude; it depended on the earning capacity of the individual himself. A continuing income might be an earned income, but yet not deserve the favour of a differentiated rate. To tax the temporary income on the higher scale, though temporary, and only because it was large, was really to introduce graduation without having the honesty to say so. One advantage of differentiation over the whole scale, that was to say above £2,000, was that they would get the full declaration of income from all except those who had no temporary income at all. In connection with the two paragraphs which he had quoted from the right hon. Gentleman's speech, he had also to consider the proposal with regard to old age pensions. Before they made promises about old age pensions two things had to be said. They ought not to promise old age pensions unless and until they could actually appropriate money to answer them. The Committee would observe that he used the word "until" as well as "unless." His second proposition was that they ought not to appropriate for old age pensions money got by reductions of the Navy. He was old-fashioned enough to believe that money got by reductions of the Navy ought to be disposed of either by remission of taxation, or by payment of Debt. Only in that way could we preserve our defensive power. If they remitted taxation, they restored the money to fructify in the pockets of the people, with the certainty that if they called for it again, in order to increase our naval strength—and who could say that they would never need to do that ?—they would only be laying on the people burdens that experience had already shown they could bear. If, on the other hand, they used the money to pay off Debt, they were creating in advance the best of all possible war chests against future naval attacks, the mere knowledge of the existence of which, in the minds of any whom it might concern, would be the best conceivable security that no such attack would be adventured. But if they pledged for ever, for old age pensions, or for any other perpetual or irrevocable charge, money saved by reducing the Navy, they would not be able, in case of need, to bring the Navy to its former strength without putting on new taxes, or raising the rate of old ones. He onfessed that he shared the uneasiness of his right hon. friend the Member for East Worcestershire, that the Budget meant that the income-tax was not only to be a permanent institution, but was also to be maintained at the present or even a higher rate; also, that it was to be administered in an increasingly inquisitorial way. In the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they were getting further and further away from the policy of making the same people find the money for the public service who spent the money. That was why he did not think that the Budget tended very much in the direction either of justice or of economy.

*SIR T. P. WHITTAKER said he regarded the Budget speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as one of the soundest and most courageous he had listened to since he had been a Member of the House. The speech of the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer proved that it was a strong Budget. The Opposition seemed troubled at the idea that the income-tax was likely to be a permanent one at a shilling. It was quite true that the Chancellor did not say it would be kept permanently at that figure, but he did say that the income-tax would be permanent. Some of them, he might say, had arrived at that conclusion twenty-five years ago. After the experience they had had of Tory finance, the way in which the late Government piled up the debt of the country, and the cost of the Army and Navy, it might be expected that the income-tax would be high. Having separated earned from unearned income the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to raise one portion altogether independently of the other. At times of national emergency, it would be much easier to raise the 1s. income-tax than it would have been if that tax involved those earning smaller incomes as was the case at present. He did not share the fears which had been expressed on this point. The ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that he was afraid the effect of the change would be that money would be invested abroad, and that incomes would go there as well. He did think any trouble would arise from foreign investments, because they would only suffer if the income from those investments did not come back to this country, and those likely to invest such incomes abroad were very few indeed. As a rule the men who inherited their wealth lived pretty well up to their incomes. The man who invested large sums of money abroad was generally the man who was making money pretty freely, namely the great business man. He was not the man who would be likely to invest his income abroad simply because there was a heavier income-tax placed upon it in this country. He could do far better with it in his own business concerns here. The right hon. Gentleman opposite seemed very much troubled about the returns being demanded from employers stating the salaries they paid. That simply amounted to this—that because a number of people who ought to pay did not pay but evaded payment, he thought it was a great pity that the law should be made effective. He did not think any sufficient reason could be given why he should sympathise more with the working man earning £180 a year than he did with the clerk earning the same sum, and if the clerk paid income-tax he thought the working man ought to pay also. It was rather a curious argument to object to a change the aim of which was to make the law more strict. Under the present law a great many evaded the tax altogether, and the right hon. Gentleman thought they ought not to be made to pay. He did not think that was the way to deal with the position. If it was thought that wage earners ought not to pay income-tax, then by all means let the House alter the law in that direction. He thought this provision for getting a return from the employers might deal to a limited extent with working men, but it would also deal with a large class who were earning considerably more than £160, but did not pay income-tax because they were difficult to get at. Surely it was only good business that they should ascertain from employers what were the incomes of those they employed in order that they might be taxed accordingly. The right hon. Gentlemen the Member for the Forest of Dean defended the use of the phrase "earned and unearned" as distinguished from "permanent and precarious." He thought the former was much the better term. It was quite true that there were difficulties and differences in regard to incomes which were derived from annuities, leaseholds and mining securities, as compared with incomes derived from Consols and other high class securities. We were, however, a practical people. Parliament had to go on definite lines, and they could not go into endless distinctions. There was a clear distinction between earned incomes and those derived from investments, whether precarious and permanent or not. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Worcestershire had given as an illustration the case of a gentleman who followed the business of an estate steward and received £1,000 a year for managing an estate. That estate must have been bringing in considerably more than £1,000 a year, because no landlord would pay £1,000 a year to a steward unless the income was very large. According to the illustration that steward gave up his position and managed an estate of his own which brought him in £1,000 a year, and it was contended that it would be unjust to tax such an income on the higher scale. The suggestion was, of course, that both positions were the same, and that in each case the income was earned. But such was not the case. The management of his own estate might occupy only a very small proportion of his time, and therefore his income would be derived not so much from actual work, but from property left to him, and surely there was all the difference in the world between the two cases. Then the right hon. Gentleman seemed very much troubled about the person deriving his income from a lot of small property, and suggested that on an estate worth £2,000 a year the amount collected in rents, rates, and taxes might amount to £4,000 a year. In such a case the rates and taxes would be deducted, and there would also be a strong case for deducting the cost of collection. The balance would be income from the property, and in no sense earned income, and he would only be taxed on his net income. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean had expressed an opinion in favour of graduation by degression. That meant that if they fixed a maximum tax of 4s. in the pound on incomes of £40,000 a year, and everybody below that was to pay less than that maximum, they would be obliged to collect the maximum tax from everybody, and then return to everybody, except 250 millionaires, some portion of the tax In some cases they would have to return 3s. 11d. out of the 4s. He thought that system a cumbersome and impracticable method, because it meant taking from the people tens of millions of money, holding it for a considerable time, and then returning it. His opinion was that if they were to graduate the rate of tax on large incomes it would have to be done by a super-tax. In regard to differentiation it had been said that £2,000 was an arbitrary figure. And so it was. If they selected any limit at all it would be arbitrary, but it did not follow that it would be undesirable. Some of them no doubt would have preferred to carry the differentiation further, but there were many difficulties in the way. At the present time there was no difficulty whatever in dealing with professional incomes like those obtained by lawyers, architects and others, because they were very simple. A salary was an earned income, and he thought they would all agree that they included amongst earned incomes the incomes of the small traders. They could not argue that the small shopkeeper did not earn his income, but in his case they had to take into consideration the capital invested in his business, and that was not quite the same thing as a salary. The difficulty was that the higher the scale went and the larger the income from a trade or business the greater would be the element of capital. The man making a large income from a business often had a large amount of capital in it. Consequently it became very difficult, unless they were prepared to call upon men in business to return the amount of their capital and make an allowance for the capital, deducting it from the total income, and treating the balance as earned income. That system would be complicated and difficult, whereas, as a matter of rough justice, if they took £2,000 as the limit—he was quite willing to go up to £3,000—they would be dealing with incomes which were very largely earned. If they went right through the scale beyond £2,000 they would find themselves landed in very great difficulties. Let them take, for example, the case of the Rothschilds. They were in business and they earned their incomes, but they all knew that those incomes were also very largely a return upon capital. If they were to include all traders as earning their income they would have to include such people as the Rothschilds, and it was absurd to argue that the Rothschilds should pay at a lower rate than a widow with a large family who had been left £750 a year which she derived from investments. In the case of a successful barrister earning from £5,000 to £10,000 a year he thought it would look a little anomalous if he were to pay income tax of 9d. while a widow with children had to pay 1s. He did not care which way they went, they would have anomalies and difficulties, but on the whole the limit of £2,000 would work fairly well. All they could do was to decide on broad lines and then do substantial justice. Any scheme would lend itself to detailed and carping criticism. After all, the object of taxation was to get money, and it must be got in substantial sums. Little fiddling distinctions were a nuisance. They cost more in collecting than they were worth. The Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted money in a lump. A considerable difficulty arose from the case of limited liability companies. Many small traders formed their businesses into companies, for family and personal reasons, and they derived an income from them which, if a private income, would entitle them to come in under a lower scale. He did not know what the Chancellor of the Exchequer's decision on that might be, but his own view was that they would have to charge the incomes from companies as incomes from investments. He was afraid they could not go into details and separate earned from unearned incomes there, and he thought that view might be justified on the broad ground that, if men took advantage of the law to place themselves in a special position for particular purposes of their own, they must consider this extra rate as part of the price they paid for occupying that position. There was a point to which, as he happened to have personal knowledge in regard to it, he would like to draw the attention of the Government namely, that at the present time a great many people who borrowed money and paid interest upon it deducted the income-tax from the interest. A very large number of those people had incomes under £700, and did not pay the 1s. rate of tax; but they always deducted the 1s. It did not matter to the man who received the interest, but it was lost to the public revenue. That applied very largely to insurance companies. That difficulty was going to be accentuated by the new differentiation. It was not for him to suggest a way out of the difficulty. It was a point which ought to be dealt with, because it might cause a leakage in the revenue. With regard to the death duties, he thought the increase which had been made was a most equitable and desirable one, and the only complaint which he made was that it was very modest. He saw no reason why the increased rate should only come on after the first £1,000,000. Why should it not apply to the whole estate and not only after passing the first £1,000,000? As he understood the proposal it was that the rate was to be 10 per cent. on an estate of £1,000,000, and if a man left £1,500,000, the rate was to be 10 per cent. on £1,000,000 and 11 per cent. on £500,000. He did not see any reason why it should not be 11 per cent. on the full amount. As to the reduction of Debt, that was where he thought this was a courageous Budget. Nothing paid better than paying off Debt. The recent fall of securities was largely owing to the great increase in national expenditure. The figures showed that the national expenditure raised by taxes in the ten years between 1887 and 1896 was £784,000,000, while the amount in the ten years between 1897 and 1906—the latest decennial period for which the figures were available—was £1,286,000,000, an increase of about £500,000,000. The expenditure by local authorities in the United Kingdom in the ten years from 1884 to 1893 was £691,000,000. In the ten years from 1894 to 1903 the amount was £1,181,000,000, an increase of £500,000,000, or nearly double. [AN HON. MEMBER: All the better.] Was it all the better? Most wise people arranged their expenditure according to their means. The result was a great fall in the value of securities, amounting to at least another £500,000,000. What did that mean? He was not expressing any opinion as to the wisdom of any particular capital expenditure. This fall in the value of securities meant that the available capital of the nation was £1,500,000,000 less. [Cries of "Not at all," and "It is largely productive."] Yes, it was £1,500,000,000 less capital available for investment and use in trade. The issue of Consols and Government stock, and the increased trade produced an increased demand for money from the market already depleted to the extent of that £1,500,000,000; therefore the price of money went up, and every municipality was suffering because they had to pay more for their money. And therefore he rejoiced that the Chancellor was going in for improving the national credit. Many Members were returned to that House with a great cry for economy, but he found that a great many of them were voicing a good many demands for expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that the working and consuming taxpayer must pay for social reform, and he understood that that was a reproach. He thought, however, that it did not lie with the right hon. Gentleman to reproach this Government with anything in that direction, because he proposed to raise the revenue by taxes on imports, which would be taxes on the working and consuming citizen. The right hon. Gentleman preferred a contributory scheme of old age pensions, but he thought he would find it would be extremely difficult, costly, and almost impracticable to carry out such a scheme. The difficulty of getting any contribution at all from the poorest and least settled section of the community would be almost insuperable. Reference had been made to the taxes on sugar and tea, but he would point out that there was a great difference between that kind of taxes and the kind of taxes which the right hon. Gentleman advocated. He himself did not like the tax on sugar, but, at any rate, it was a tax on the whole article. If, however, a tax were put on only the wheat and corn which came from foreign countries, leaving wheat and corn from the Colonies and British possessions to come in free, it meant that the price of the whole wheat and corn consumed in this country would be increased, while a revenue would be obtained from only a very small portion. Another thing was that, if they were to look forward to anything like a satisfactory scheme of old age pensions and other social reforms, they would want a very considerable revenue. He remembered the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham admitting that he would never have gone into the question of tariff reform but for the purpose of gaining revenue for old age pensions. At the same time they were told that we were to be a self-contained Empire, and that only foreign wheat and corn and manufactured goods were to be taxed. He could not help wondering where the money for old age pensions was to come from when we became self-contained and imported no corn on which tax was paid. It was said that there was to be no tax on raw material; but had the right hon. Gentleman opposite considered the difficulty of finding out what a raw material was? Steel plates and bar iron were the raw materials for making machinery; leather was a manufactured article of the currier, but the raw material of the shoemaker; dyes and chemicals were manufactured articles, but the raw material of the dyer and manufacturer of many articles. Were all these things to be taxed? It seemed to him that the Budget was a sound and courageous one. As he had said, if they were to look forward to anything like a satisfactory scheme of old-age pensions, they would want a very considerable revenue, and while he did not agree as to what was meant by a contributory policy, he thought they ought to look for contributions through taxation towards those pensions from all classes of the community in proportion to their means.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor) said he quite agreed with what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, that it was necessary for them to some extent to limit their remarks; and he proposed to address the Committee in that sense. The three most prominent features of the Budget were:—first, the establishment of the income-tax as a permanent part of our fiscal system; secondly, the determination to increase the death duties upon those who were too few to unite in resistance; and thirdly, the non-interference with indirect taxation, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted he could not afford. These three points showed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a nervous feeling that he had come to the end of his resources. He could not but think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal to make a permanent 1s. income-tax—for that was what it came to, although he demurred officially to the simple statement—was a very dangerous departure. They had heard over and over again what were the economic objections to an income tax at all, and that it could only be defended as an emergency tax. They knew that it was a tax on capital, and in that respect paralysed enterprise, and affected wages. The most eminent statisticians, such as Sir Robert Giffen, were insistent upon relieving it. Mr. Gladstone himself had repeatedly condemned it in emphatic words, as a dangerous, vexatious, and demoralising tax, which affected the trade and industry of the country more than any other; and yet, that was the tax which the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to impose on the country as a permanent tax! What was going to happen in the event of an emergency arising? Was it to be increased to 1s. 6d. in the pound and proportionately to 1s. 3d. in the pound to those whose incomes were under £2,000 a year? If so, that was a very serious outlook for the country. War was not the only emergency which might arise. For instance, if the cost of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme for old age pensions was under-estimated, as it easily might be, an emergency might arise ten or fifteen years after it came into operation which would necessitate the provision of large additional funds, and it would be very undesirable that the whole of these should come out of the income-tax. It would dislocate the industries of the country. He did not think hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial Benches properly appreciated how strong also was the sense of injustice that many people might feel in regard to the increase of that tax, and in consequence he was not at all sure that it would not be evaded even with the reduction on earned incomes which was proposed. It would certainly be evaded from that sense of injustice if it were to be raised to 1s. 6d. or 2s. whenever there was an emergency. The President of the Board of Education had said that he could not see how it could effectually be evaded. His information had been drawn from reading the Report of the Select Committee, in which Sir Henry Primrose had pointed out that it would not be at all difficult for people to evade the tax. The evidence pointed to the probability that people here would transfer their capital to other countries, would transfer their property to their children in their lifetime, and that the revenue from their investments abroad would be remitted to them direct instead of through their bankers. The President of the Board of Education asked to what countries they could transfer their capital and not be subject to income-tax. He would suggest the principality of Monaco, Canada, or the United States, and he really did not see what there was to prevent people who were so minded from transferring a large portion of their property from this country to other parts of the world, and thus not only evade any increase of the income-tax, but also the 1s. in the pound they were paying at the present time. The proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be likely to frighten away the people who had been described as "the idle rich," the very people whom he desired to catch, and they would evade the tax. Moreover, rich people would also take into account the death duties—which the Chancellor of the Exchequer was increasingly—as part of the gross taxation they paid, and that also would influence them. There was some evidence before the House that the taxation of this country, taking the income-tax and the death duties together, was probably higher, certainly as high, as that of any other country. At any rate he read with considerable interest the evidence of Mr. Bernard Mallet, who had made a special study of income-tax in this and other countries, and had arrived at the conclusion that the effect of our present system as to combination of the death duties and income-tax was already practically equal in severity, for differentiation, to that in force in any foreign country or colony. If that was so, was it surprising that people should take the course referred to in the evidence of Sir Felix Schuster, who said that certain investors had to his knowledge made inquiries in regard to, and had already placed investments in the hands of bankers in New York and Paris. That meant that there was a tendency to evasion already manifesting itself among certain income-tax payers. It appeared to him from the evidence of experts who were acquainted with the subject, therefore, that it was far from certain that the Government would not lose as much as they gained by putting on an increased income-tax, as they would frighten away the very people out of whom they wished to get the money, and they would find the money they wished to secure slip through their fingers. Of course, the real question was the point at which they would resist, and he said in his humble judgment that the point of resistance had been reached now that the proposals of the Government had been put forward. If the Committee thought differently he could only say they must wait and see what occurred in the future. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had drawn a distinction between earned and unearned income, but he doubted whether that distinction would be received quite so popularly as the right hon. Gentleman was disposed to believe. At all events, he had had one or two very interesting letters from his constituents upon the subject, and they could certainly not be called millionaires. He thought that the small tradesman and employee viewed the question from a standpoint which had not been sufficiently discussed in the House. In a letter which had reached him two days previously it was said—

> "A man or woman may work hard for thirty or forty years, save a little money, and invest it, and then just in their declining years they are to be taxed far more than the young, strong, and healthy man who is able to work."

He was sure that there was a widespread feeling in the country that the Government were going to tax incomes from investments with that result. He thought the distinction which the Chancellor of the Exchequer made between earned and unearned income was an unfortunate one from that point of view and was not likely to be popular. He considered that the Chancellor of the Exchequer by requiring a compulsory declaration of income from men with incomes of over £2,000 a year would lose the co-operation of that class. There was nothing that an Englishman resented so much as prying into his private affairs for a purpose which he did not consider necessary, and he did not think that any man would calmly sit down to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or anyone else, a full and complete declaration of his income from all sources when it would not benefit him in any way and was only made in an inquisitorial manner for the purpose of taxing him more highly in the future. He thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore, would find that his arrow had been shot in vain. He approved, however, of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals for the reduction of Debt, as he thought they were statesmanlike and excellent, and he also approved of his proposal to sweep aside the barrier which divided local from Imperial taxation. Then as to the remedy for the present state of things, for they were ready to propose one from that side, they could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman's wild declarations about free trade. He did not know, for instance, why he could not abate some of the incidence of taxation, say, upon chocolate and cocoa imported from the Colonies, which was heavily taxed. He did not know, moreover, why there should not be a reduction of the tea, coffee, or sugar duties upon goods coming from the same quarter. It was ludicrous that under our boasted free import system manufactured chocolate was protected and taxed on importation here 2s. 3d. to 8s. 6d. more than raw cocoa. He supposed the answer was that the Free Trade Party would not touch anything which savoured of colonial preference. He was sorry that that had not been done, but he felt certain that the time would come when the country would insist upon it, and it might be left to his Party to carry out what the Party opposite had completely declined to do, their idea of a remedy being to broaden the basis of taxation. The only breadth of this character, however, that appeared to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's sight was that the income-tax payer had a good broad basis to his back, upon which he intended to apply his rod. He thought the Opposition remedy was infinitely better, and that was tariff reform and colonial preference. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to forget that when the 1s. duty on corn was taken off nobody was ever heard to say that he was richer for it; on the contrary, he thought it would be an advantage, from the point of view of Empire, to have some duty of that kind. If the colonial corn was allowed to come in free it would be the foreign producer who would pay the 1s. or 2s. duty which might be imposed, because the foreigner must come down to the price of the colonial. If a scheme of that sort were adopted it would be much more efficacious than the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifeshire, E.): I rise now because unfortunately later on in the evening before the close of the debate I have another engagement elsewhere which I am obliged to fulfil, and as I do not wish to be regarded as disrespectful to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer I wish to notice the speech he made at the beginning of the debate. In one respect I set a very bad example to the Committee which has been universally followed by, I think, every speaker in the debate. I made a very long speech on Thursday last, and during the whole time I have been in the House to-day I have not heard a single short speech except that of my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Education. I am going now to try to repair my bad example by compressing what I have to say into the fewest possible sentences. I rise really for the purpose only of removing misconceptions due, I am afraid, to want of clearness in some of the language that I myself used, though I did my utmost to make it clear; misconceptions which are prevalent outside, and which to some extent are reflected in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. For instance, I said in emphatic terms when introducing the Budget that we must face the fact that the income-tax had now become an integral part of our fiscal machinery. The right hon. Gentleman did not quarrel with that, but he translated it into something entirely different, namely, that I suggested, which I never did, that the income-tax was to be treated as a tax that was to remain permanent at, at least, 1s. if not something more. I defy any one to find a single sentence in my speech to justify that contention. At any rate that is not my view, and indeed it would be a most illegitimate use of political prophecy on my part to attempt to forecast what five, ten, or fifteen years hence the fiscal system of this country might be. I am budgeting, as I said on Thursday last, for the next two or three years, and it is in reference to that situation and that situation alone that what I said then and what I say now applies. Another question was put to me founded on an entirely different apprehension by my right hon. friend the Member for the Forest of Dean. I said I thought that if we were going in for a policy of social reform, which costs money, all classes of the community must contribute their share of the expense. That I think, is self evident, and I am certain there is not a representative of the working classes in this House who will not admit it to its fullest extent. I said further, in regard to two principal indirect taxes upon necessaries of life, namely, the sugar duty and the tea duty, that I did not feel I could make any remission in them consistently with the general object I presented to the House. That object is two-fold. In the first instance, we have imposed on us the duty, both by the exigencies of the country and by our own declarations and pledges, to make a manful, courageous, and exceptional effort to repair the public credit. I put that in the forefront at this moment as the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman has only to remember that in consequence of the South African War we have an addition to the National Debt of £130,000,000 to see that any Chancellor of the Exchequer who duly appreciates the gravity of the national situation is bound to make a solemn appeal to the House of Commons to forego remission of taxation in order to help him to relieve and mitigate this tremendous burden of debt. That is my first object. What is my second? My second is to provide the nucleus of a fund for social reforms, and in particular for making a start with that which I believe everyone, on both sides of the House, agrees is the most urgent instalment of social reform. I cannot fulfil those objects unless I ask the country and the House, as I do ask them, to make some sacrifice by foregoing remission of taxation this year. Of course, I know that the right hon. Gentleman opposite would tell me, in fact, I rather anticipated it in my speech, that I was a purblind and fanatical devotee of an obsolete system of fiscal philosophy, and that I had only to raise my vision to a wider horizon to see that there were large tracts of untaxed territory which were only awaiting the attention of a Chancellor of the Exchequer. I used an expression that seems to have given some pain to the right hon. Gentleman when I said that we were limited in our area of taxation. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was other ground, but I confess I prefer ground which is sound to ground which is boggy. The right hon. Gentleman differs from that, and complained that I should have been so disrespectful to a system of fiscal policy which prevailed in many continental countries and in a large number of our Colonies. But we are not missionaries or professors to lecture other countries on what they ought to do. The question is what should be done here in the United Kingdom. It is not necessary for the purposes of the free trade argument—I suppose I have made more speeches on the subject than any man in the House during the three years the controversy lasted, and I cannot charge my memory with having laid down on any single occasion any abstract principle as to the necessary superiority of free trade in all countries at all times and under all circumstances—it is sufficient for our purpose to say that here in these islands we cannot live and cannot carry on our industries; cannot keep our command of the markets of the world, and cannot keep open this the largest market in the world for foreign and Colonial products; cannot maintain the position which lies at the root of the foundation of our prosperity, unless we adhere not only to the doctrine but to the practice of free trade. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has told me where I might find the resources to make it possible to remit part of the income-tax, reduce the sugar duty, and perhaps to repeal the tea duty. Where am I to find those resources? By adopting a system of what is called Colonial preference. That is to say by taxing food products—corn, meat, butter, and the rest, the necessary staple food of the great majority of our population—which come from foreign countries at a higher rate than those which come from our Colonial possessions. But you cannot do justice even on the broadest and roughest scale between the different parts of the Empire unless you supplement preference on food by preference on raw material. South Africa, for instance, does not send food, but wool and hides, the raw material of some of our greatest industries. What answer can you give to South Africa when she complains that you have given a preference to Canada and Australia and says that she also is entitled to some share in the benefit of the arrangement entered into in the interests of the Empire for the purpose of strengthening its bonds? I have never seen any answer to that argument, and no answer has ever been given to it from that bench or anywhere else. The essential difference between the sugar and tea duties, which I agree are grievous taxes which weigh heavily on the class of our population least able to bear the burden, and those other taxes which it is proposed to substitute for them, is that they have this merit, that substantially the whole of the added price which the consumer pays, owing to the tax, goes into the Exchequer, whereas under the old system of the protective duties a large part of the added price which the consumer pays would be intercepted by the favoured interests. That is the reason why we stick to what the right hon. Gentleman regards as an antiquated system. The right hon. Gentleman complains of the inquisitorial developments in the income-tax which were outlined in my Budget speech. I have no paternal pride in the matter at all. This inquisitorial arrangement, which I am accused of having invented, is substantially founded on the suggestions of the able Departmental Committee appointed by the right hon. Gentleman himself, which sat for two years, and which was presided over by that clear-headed and excellent man of business, Lord Ritchie, whose loss we all deplore. It is a strange perversion of some observation I suppose I happened to drop, to say that I propose the abolition of the three years average in arriving at the amount to be paid by the income-tax payer. I have suggested nothing of the kind; it would be a monstrous thing to do. What I am going to ask the House to sanction—and it will be very beneficial to the revenue and do no harm to anybody if it is carried out—is to repeal Section 133 of the Act of 1842, which enables a man, if in his year of assessment his income falls below the amount of the three years average, to make application to have part of the amount paid refunded. This involves a loss to the revenue, and there is really no loss to the taxpayer if his year of assessment is unfruitful, for that year will, of course, come into the calculation for the next three years, and there is no reason whatever for going through the complicated system of refunding That is the arrangement we propose, following, not exactly the recommendation, but the spirit of the recommendation, of the Committee. I have been censured for having an open mind. I do not know why. I remember a Government that lived on an open mind. The late Prime Minister reproaches me with not having an open mind; the late Chancellor of the Exchequer because I have an open mind.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I did not reproach the right hon. Gentleman for having an open mind; he gave me to understand that he had no mind on the subject at all, though he subsequently corrected that impression. I was criticising the attitude I understood him to have adopted, that he had not made up his mind, and had not formed any opinion on the subject, until he then spoke.

MR. ASQUITH: I do not in the least object to the interruption. As a matter of fact, there is no doubt that the arguments are nicely balanced upon this question of pension. It may be treated as deferred pay, and, it may be argued, is therefore entitled to the lower rate; or it may be treated as accumulated savings—accumulated, no doubt, by compulsion, the recipient not being a free agent, accumulated on his behalf by somebody else—and when he comes to the enjoyment of this, at his time of retiring, it may be argued that it should be treated as property and taxed on the higher scale. There is a great deal to be said on either side, and therefore I think I am not acting disrespectfully towards the Committee when I say that before I fully make up my mind I shall be glad to hear what is to be said on either side. My sole object is to avoid imposing a grievance, and at the same time I do not want to admit a principle of exemption which may be capable of indefinite and illegitimate extension in other directions. The right hon. Gentleman has put several concrete cases, most of which, not all, have been dealt with by the President of the Board of Education; but there was one point in reference to which he sought to score against me. He said I had departed from the terms "precarious" and "permanent" incomes which I had formerly used, and that now I propose to take as the real test or criterion of incomes—entitled to the lower or subject to the higher scale —whether they are "earned" or "unearned." Well, I frankly admit I am indebted to the Committee for their remarks on the subject, and I am convinced that the latter is the more logical arrangement for differentiating between the two classes. It is better understood, in popular parlance, as explaining what we want to have, namely, that the income taxed at a lower rate shall be that which is earned by personal labour or exertion. The other night I illustrated my argument by reference to the hardships that arise under the existing system, which taxes both earned and unearned income at the same rate. I pointed out how hardly this bore upon the man who makes provision for his old age. I was not contending, and I do not think I was understood as contending, for more than that the lumping the earned and unearned incomes in one category was doing an obvious and undesirable injustice. No doubt there will be many cases brought forward; the right hon. Gentleman is not the only recipient of letters on the subject. It is a very odd thing—and I cannot but refer to it—that you never in these cases get a single expression of gratitude in these letters from any of the people of the class whom by your legislation or your change in taxation it is intended to benefit. On the contrary, the moment you make a proposal, which it is not denied will be an immense boon to a large number of people, you are overwhelmed with letters containing objurgations and indignant remonstrances from people who have been paying the shilling all their taxpaying lives, and who did not know they had a grievance until, finding themselves near the border line of differentiation, they cry out to be allowed to come over to enjoy the relief. That is the character of the correspondence. I say frankly you can find nothing approaching mathematical or, as old philosophers would call it, strict distributive justice in this class of case; the perplexities and complications of human nature and society and industry are so great that no wit of man has ever yet conceived a perfectly logical system. All we can do is to try something that will be a nearer approximation to justice than the present system. I have studied the subject, and shall continue to study the subject, with as much sympathy as I can command—and there have been large drafts upon my reserve of sympathy; I shall study all such cases in the hope that, if they can be brought within the equity of the change, they may in some form be brought within the exemption. What used to perturb Mr. Gladstone, as will be seen by reference to his statement on the Budget of 1852—I think it was—and as will be seen from the passage of the Report which has been read of the Committee of 1861—a rather colourless Report, drawn up, apparently, by Sir Stafford Northcote —what used to perturb Mr. Gladstone was the picture of the poor widow with £150 or £300 a year, left by her husband, with which she had to bring up her children and give them a start in life. Mr. Gladstone could not help contrasting this picture with that of a bustling young and energetic professional man who, though really making the same income, could look forward to a considerable improvement of his position in the future. This was the case Mr. Gladstone constantly quoted, and it was a case which impressed the House of Commons. But let the Committee remember that extensions of our illogical and haphazard system of exemptions and abatements have enormously reduced hardships of this character. The poor widow whose income is £300 does not pay 1s. income-tax; she has an abatement of £160, and only pays on £140, and the rate in fact comes to 5½d. in the pound. The additional relief in a case like that, with this measure of differentation, would be almost infinitesimal. In point of fact you get rid of almost all—I will not say all—but by far the most serious cases of hardship by the exemptions rising as high as £700, and, on the other hand, by keeping the limit at £2,000. Confining ourselves within these limits we get rid of the most oppressive burdens existing, and, without predicting or prejudging what hereafter may be the figure of the tax should it become a permanent part of our fiscal system, I ask the Committee to accept the proposal put before them as one which, on the whole, is a long-delayed and much-needed measure of practical justice to the taxpayers of the country.

*MR. HICKS BEACH (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury) said that with regard to the question of differentiation, neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the President of the Board of Education had given the Committee any information whatever as to the bearing of the incidence of the death duties upon it. Anyone who had read the Report of the Select Committee must have been impressed by the evidence given by Sir Henry Primrose, who pointed out that, although the income-tax did not of itself provide for differentiation, yet differentiation was provided for indirectly by the stamp duties, the house duty, and the death duties. Some very interesting tables were laid before the Committee showing exactly what effect the death duties had in regard to differentiation. He would like to draw the attention of the Committee to the figures given in those tables. Sir Henry Primrose produced a table which proved that the estate duties really amounted to a very heavy burden on the inheritor of an estate; and his figures showed that a person who succeeded to an estate worth from £1,000 to £10,000 bringing in an income of £40 to £400, really paid a charge on his annual income of 9d. in the pound. In the case of estates worth £10,000 to £25,000 that charge amounted to 1s. in the pound; £25,000 to £50,000, 1s. 1½d.; and £50,000 to £75,000, 1s. 3d. Those were very striking figures, and they ought to be seriously taken into consideration. He thought some reason ought to be given by the Government for not following the advice of the Commissioners of the Board of Inland Revenues, who were in favour of adhering the system of differentiation afforded by the death duties instead of adopting the present proposal. Mr. Bernard Mallet also showed by another table that a person who inherited an estate bringing in £200 a year paid 2·60 of his whole income in annual charges, whereas a person earning a similar income only paid 1 per cent. of his income. In other words a person who inherited an estate bringing in £200 a year paid 2·60 times as much as the person who was earning £200 a year. A person inheriting an estate worth £500 a year paid 5·64 of his whole income whereas the possessor of an earned income of £500 a year paid 3·50. An income from an estate of £700 paid 6·64 and an earned income of £700 4·50, and so on up to £2,000, when the unearned income paid 7·40 and an earned income of that amount 5 per cent. Those calculations were based on the estate duties only, and did not include charges under the legacy succession and settlement estate duties; and if those were taken together the proportion would be very much higher. Those were very important points, and he submitted to the Committee that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had determined to carry out a system of differentiation it would have been much more simple to have readjusted the scale of these various duties. What he suggested would have saved an infinite amount of trouble and expense, and would have avoided a very great feeling of injustice which would undoubtedly be experienced by those who came just outside the limit. This differentiation would compel a person to pay upon his savings and he would be penalised, whereas if the death duties were adopted to carry out the principle of differentiation the person who would have to pay the penalty would not be the man who earned the savings, but the person who inherited them. He was under the impression that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean had stated that the Committee which considered the question of the graduation of the income-tax were in favour of this differentiation. He did not think that was correct, because what the Committee reported was that the system was practicable; but they did not report that it was desirable; and nobody who read the evidence put forward by the officials of the Board of Inland Revenue could come to any other conclusion. Sir Henry Primrose, when asked whether he was in favour of the new system of differentiation said that he was not, and that if anything was done in that direction it should be done by means of the death duties. As regarded earned and unearned incomes, he agreed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had adopted the best terms. The terms suggested were permanent and precarious incomes or incomes derived from investments or personal exertions. It was obvious that many incomes derived from investments were anything but permanent, and incomes derived from personal exertions were often very precarious; and those distinctions would have led to very great difficulties. The hon. Member for the Spen Valley Division had clearly pointed out that there would be considerable difficulty in the case of small traders to find out what part of their income was derived from personal exertions, and what part was the result of the investment of their capital. He was strongly in favour of the differentiation not being put higher than £2,000. With regard to the case of an owner managing his own estate, he did not think that point had received a fair answer. The President of the Board of Education had said that nothing new had happened in such a case, because the landlord was assessed under Schedule A and the farmer was assessed in his profits under Schedule B. That was quite true, but it did not touch the question of how much time a man managing his own estate spent upon it. At the present moment the landlord paid far more in excess of his share of taxation than any other income-taxpayer; because anyone who knew anything of the management of an estate was aware that the allowance made in respect of upkeep was totally inadequate. A landlord was always assessed on the gross rental of his farms, upon which he was allowed a reduction of ⅛ upon land and ⅙ on buildings. He submitted that those two abatements were not by any means a fair proportion of what the owner actually spent upon the upkeep of his estate. If a landlord managing his own estate was not to be treated as earning his income the least they could do was to give the landlord a fair abatement in respect of the upkeep of his estate and of the time he spent upon its managment. The question of the effect these stages would have upon the actual revenue was a very important one. It was impossible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to estimate correctly what the actual difference would be. One thing was, however, undoubtedly true, and that was that there would be very many hard cases and much injustice would be felt by those people who came just outside the limit. He instanced the case for example of two men earning by their own personal exertions £1,900 a year each. One of them had accumulated no savings, but the other by careful expenditure and economical management had managed to save a sum which brought him in £200 a year from investments. That income from his savings would bring him over the limit and he would not be able to claim any abatement on the earning clause, while his friend who had not saved anything would be able to claim an abatement. That was a great hardship which would certainly lead to discontent. He was afraid under these proposals people would be tempted not to furnish proper returns of their income, or else they would be tempted to divide up portions of their income and invest them in separate funds amongst their children. In that case people might keep themselves below the limit and claim abatements. All these things would have a very considerable effect on the revenue of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

And, it being a quarter-past Eight of the clock, and there being Private Business set down by direction of the CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS under Standing Order No. 8, further Proceeding was postponed without Question put.

LONDON PORT AND DOCKS BILL [BY ORDER].

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*MR. BARNARD (Kidderminster) moved that the Bill be read upon this day six months. He said he did not propose to go at any length over the contents of the Bill, although he thought it contained propositions which would be very legitimate matter of debate upon the Second Reading. It appeared to him that the proposed dues on goods should be collected at the Customs House by the public authority. The proposal to divide between the dock companies and the river authority the proceeds of the port dues was in his opinion open to objection because the dock companies were profit-making concerns, and it was a very grave question whether such a proposition should receive the sanction of the House. He desired to discuss the measure not so much upon what it contained as upon the larger consideration of what he regarded as the interests of the Port of London. It appeared to him that at the present time there was every reason why, in the interests of the port, they should pause before they did anything further of a piecemeal character. The considerations which governed the interests of the port required a comprehensive measure once and for all dealing with the whole subject. The Port of London was altogether unique. It stood apart from nearly every other port in the country. He did not desire to take up the time of the House by going over the different propositions which had brought them to the position they occupied that night. There was no doubt that the present stagnation had arisen through the jealousy of the varying interests involved. It was not necessary for him to point out the great differences between the Port of London and the other ports of the United Kingdom. Everybody knew that Manchester had the ship canal. They knew what had been done in connection with the Mersey by the Dock and Harbour Board, and they were familiar also with the efforts which had been made in connection with the Tyne and the Clyde. He did not propose to discuss the details of these different ports. The dominating question which existed in connection with all of them was how the necessary money was to be got in order to carry out the work, and what ought to be the controlling body which should carry out the administrative work. There were different proposals continually placed before the House in connection with this subject. They heard a great deal about Antwerp and the Thames Conservancy, to which he happened to belong. He had made two or three expeditions to Antwerp and other important Continental ports to investigate what had been done there, and to get the advantage of knowledge of what was going on. But the Port of Antwerp could not be properly compared to that of London on business grounds, for these reasons. Antwerp was aided enormously by what he would term national funds. The Port of London, after all, had been conducted on purely business lines. When he looked at the figures as to how these different ports had progressed he said at once that the comparison in his opinion was altogether fallacious. If he read the figures showing what London had really done it would appear that the result was not so bad. In fact, the Port of London would bear a good deal of looking into. In 1895 the Port of London tonnage of shipping inwards with cargo amounted to 14,200,000, while for the last year in respect of which figures were available the tonnage was 17,450,000. Liverpool had risen from 7,800,000 to 9,800,000. He mentioned these figures simply by way of illustration in order to show that London had increased by a larger tonnage than any other port, and that at the present moment it stood in the proud position of being more than equal to Antwerp and Rotterdam put together, their combined total being only 14,000,000. This question was a difficult one, and he believed that the main trouble had arisen in connection with what was to be done in regard to the taking over of the docks and wharves. He did not know what might be the feeling in the House, but they were all familiar with the findings of the Royal Commission. They recollected that if the original idea of taking over the water companies had been earlier accepted on the recommendations of Mr. Cross's Committee, or even that of Sir William Vernon Harcourt, it would have been a great deal better for London. They knew, equally in connection with licenses, that if Mr. Bruce's proposals had been accepted at the time they were made, it would have been better for all of them. He ventured to think that in this country it was generally recognised that a private interest was not to be ruthlessly interfered with. He was not going to lay down what principle ought to be followed respecting control, but he believed the time was coming when the Government should face the question of the Port of London and produce legislation which would, as far as possible, do no harm to the private individual but lay down the principle that the port should be controlled by a public authority, and that the present condition of affairs should be ended—that the Thames Conservancy, as it now existed, should cease to exist—and that there should be an authority governing the upper river, and be another authority controlling the Port of London. From his experience as a member of the Thames Conservancy he was personally of opinion that that body had been unduly assailed by people who did not understand its working or its powers. According to the powers at their disposal and according to the weapons and tools they had to work with, he, with all respect, expressed the view that they had done the very best they possibly could do in the circumstances. Whenever they had made proposals they had been assailed by particular interests—persons who were looking after their own particular affairs. The Thames Conservancy proposed a Bill after the Report of the Royal Commission was published, and it adopted as far as possible the recommendations of the Commission. After a time it became evident that the whole Bill could not pass. The Thames Conservancy therefore threw over a great many of its propositions, but it left in one which carried with it the principle that the Thames Conservancy should be immediately entrusted with power to raise revenue for the purpose of extended dredging. What was the answer of the Thames Conservancy? That was passed unanimously through the House, and the Thames Conservancy, in carrying it into effect, had done what he believed would be of great future advantage to the Port of London. He thought that the policy of the Thames Conservancy could not be fairly attacked. They had made no serious mistake, but they simply had not the means to carry out the work which it was necessary for them to undertake. He would not attempt to discuss what ought to be the constitution of the Port of London, but personally he could not help feeling this. He recognised that the London County Council proposal to have a controlling interest was a perfectly legitimate one if they were to be responsible for the financial security to carry on the new authority. In that case they were undoubtedly entitled to a controlling influence. He himself favoured the lines of the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board, the Tyne Commissioners, and the Clyde Trustees, as much more desirable in the interest of all concerned. Briefly put, it amounted to this, that those who provided the money—the shipowners, due-payers, or whoever they might be—were the people who were best qualified to see that the money was properly spent. If they required business facilities they would not hesitate to tax themselves in order to raise revenue to improve the port, for the purpose of assisting in the development of their business. As to economical expenditure, if it really was their money that was going out they would be very careful to see that it was wisely and properly spent. They knew that in connection with Liverpool and the two northern ports that system had worked very well indeed, and he thought that it would be so also in London. Last year when a similiar Motion was proposed by the hon. Member for St. Pancras, he suggested that it was desirable that there should be a conference of the parties principally concerned. The President of the Board of Trade agreed to that idea, and a conference was held, the discussions at which cleared the air. It did not accomplish all they wished, but some points of difference were compassed and he thought the decisions arrived at would make it easier for the Government Department to draft the measure which they proposed to bring forward. A great deal had been heard about the Port of Antwerp. That port received assistance out of the public funds of the Belgian Government. The British Government had made themselves responsible as guarantors for Irish land, and he thought it would not be unreasonable if, in some form or another, on business lines they took upon themselves responsibility in connection with the development of the Port of London. He did not believe they would be ever called upon to fulfil any guarantee. The port could easily be made self-supporting. It was for this reason, among others, that he ventured to move the postponement of the Bill, for he was hopeful that the President of the Board of Trade would announce his intention of bringing in a measure, which, once and for all, might settle this very great and vital question.

*MR. W. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said that the Second Reading of the Dock Company's Bill afforded a very welcome opportunity for discussing the urgent needs of the Port of London. That was perhaps the best that could be said about it. The recent disclosures concerning the contribution made by the Dock Company to political propaganda would hardly have inclined the ear of the House of Commons towards them, even if the Bill itself, in view of the history of the movement for the reform of the Port of London, had not been altogether an impossible proposition. What were the proposals put forward by the Dock Companies, and what relation did they bear to the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and to the Bill of the late Government? First of all, it was proposed to impose upon all goods imported from over seas (except transhipment goods) dues on a scale copied from that in force in the Port of Liverpool. The Dock Company and the Conservancy were to share in the proceeds of these dues in proportion to the amount of goods discharged in the river and docks respectively. The exact amount of the yield was not certain, but in all it should not be less than £750,000 per annum, and of this it was estimated that two-thirds would go to the Dock Company. It was notable that in addressing his shareholders in 1902, Mr. Cater Scott, the Chairman of the London and India Docks Company said, that "A proper system of charges need not be as high as the Liverpool Schedule." It had also to be remembered that the dock rates and charges were in most cases higher in London than in Liverpool, so that to add to the dues actually levied in Liverpool would be detrimental to the interests of those using the Port. Further, the Government Bill in 1903 did not impose dues, but only gave the Commission the option of imposing them, and it was clear from the proceedings on that Bill that it was not necessarily intended that the option should be exercised. It was, of course, impossible to exaggerate the importance of not making London a dear port. The evidence given before the Commission by the London Waterside Manufacturers Committee stated that the members of that committee imported annually 8,000,000 tons of raw material. Thus it was easy to understand what enabled

London to be a great manufacturing centre, and the raw material so imported was actually able to compete in the manufactured form with foreign goods which came in at the same port. The second desire of the company was to put a tax on barges, amounting to 3s. 6d. on those under 100 tons, and 5s. on those over. It was hoped that the yield of that tax would amount to £30,000 a year. The Royal Commission considered the proposal to curtail the ancient right known as "free water," and described it as an attempt by the company to secure "power to tax their rivals in trade in order to recover a lost position." He would come in a moment to the important part played by the wharves in the success of the port, and it was only necessary now to say that any proposal to limit their present privileges would have to be considered with the greatest care. The third proposal of the company was to reduce the shipping dues from 1s. 6d. to 1s. It would be remembered that some five years ago these dues were raised from 1s. to the statutory maximum of 1s. 6d. In view of the profits which the company would derive were their other proposals accepted, it was not surprising that they were willing to bait their line with this sprat. He now came to what the company proposed to do in return for the privileges conferred. They offered to spend £2,000,000 on dock extensions. That sounded a large figure, but it was worth remembering that Mr. Cater Scott in his evidence spoke of two or three millions which would be "necessary for meeting all the dock requirements of the port on very moderate terms." Further, the Royal Commission recommended an expenditure of £4,500,000 on dock extensions and improvements. What the proposals amounted to, therefore, was that the company proposed to spend less than half what the Royal Commission recommended, and yet desired to impose a scale of dues on goods which was certainly much heavier than the Commission ever contemplated. The next proposal was that the Thames Conservancy should spend £1,000,000 on improving the river. Whether that proposal was made with the consent and approbation of the Conservators was not stated, but under the new scheme of dues it was estimated that they would receive about £237,500. The Royal Commission suggested that a sum of £2,500,000 should be spent on dredging, and proposed, as it would be remembered, that the London County Council should find the money. Then there was the power which it was proposed to give the Board of Trade to increase the number of Conservators from thirty-eight to forty-five. What was the reason for that? The Bill sought to give the dock companies public money. It proposed what was in effect a tax on all the trade of London, and as they had a Government pledged to public control following public money, the promoters felt constrained to make an offer which should have at least the appearance of a concession to the public. It took the facetious form of "public money for the docks, public control for the Conservancy." Was it necessary to add that no such tinkering could possibly make the Thames Conservancy a suitable port authority? To sum up the objections, no private Bill could possibly deal with a problem of this magnitude. That was the reason given by the Conservative Government for rejecting the London County Council Bill in 1905. Further, the present proposals were quite inadequate to meet the needs of the port. The Commission recommended an expenditure of four and a half millions on the docks, and two and a half millions on the river. Again, it was of paramount importance to keep London a cheap port. The Commission only countenanced the imposition of dues as a last resort. Finally the object of the Bill was to set up the finances of the dock companies, and in consequence it would increase the purchase price should it ever become necessary for a port authority to take them over. The fact that the company's proposal was a bad one did not diminish the urgency of the problem. There was absolute unanimity as to the necessity for a new port authority. The mere enumeration of the existing bodies and their powers and constitution proved the need for a unified control. On the need for a new authority the Conservators, the London Chamber of Commerce, and Lord Desborough's Committee were all in agreement. Leaving the question of the constitution of such an authority, he came to the powers which should be bestowed upon it, and the important question of taking over the docks. Supposing the new authority purchased the whole undertaking—docks, warehouses, and all as a going concern. They then would find themselves in this dilemma. If they kept the warehouses, they would be in active competitions with the wharfingers. If, however, as was half-heartedly recommended by the Royal Commission, they disposed of the warehouses, they would then have parted with the most profitable part of the undertaking, and at a price which must entail a loss, because clearly the warehouses as an independent undertaking would not be so valuable as when running in connection with the docks. That certainly did not point to the advisability of the purchase of the docks. There was another matter worth consideration from the business point of view. Was it wise to put public money into dock undertakings? Let the case of the wharves be considered. These wharves dealt with an enormous and increasing amount of the trade of the port. The Royal Commission said that—

and the Thames Conservancy in support of their Bill in 1905 said—

> "More than one-half of the tonnage of the port is dealt with at wharves and moorings in the river, and in respect of that part of its trade London is the cheapest port in Europe, so far as the dues payable to the port authority are concerned."

Taking the figures of 1901 and 1905, it was found that in that period, while the total tonnage dealt with in the docks had increased by only 207,953, the total tonnage dealt with in the port had increased by 1,236,494. It had to be remembered, too, that at Hamburg, Rotterdam, and Antwerp large use was made of river quays. Sir Thomas Sutherland and Mr. Beckett Hill advocated this development before the Royal Commission, and it was stated that at one time the Peninsular and Oriental Company had actually purchased land with a view to constructing such a quay. It was a striking fact that in Antwerp, notwithstanding the recent addition to dock accommodation, more than half the tonnage was dealt with at river quays, and, further, the average tonnage of the ships was greater at the quays than at the docks. It was true that at the moment all the development was taking the shape of docks, but when the question of the diversion of the river bed was settled, no doubt the construction of more river quays would be proceeded with. Finally, he might point out that quite recently the Board of Trade had sanctioned an undertaking for the construction of river quays at Long Reach. Those considerations made it necessary to think carefully before recommending the purchase of the docks by the new authority. This was not a question, however, the decision of which need stand in the way of the setting up of the new port authority which they all desired to see. There were many duties quite unconnected with the management of docks and warehouses. There was the deepening of the river which the Commission estimated to cost £2,500,000. Surely it was not too much to ask that the Goverment should find that money. London handled 31 per cent. of the import trade of the country, and the service might well be regarded as a national one. The new authority might also take over the maintenance, management, and control of dock entrances and waterways. These, of course, were only suggestions, but with a strong Commission consisting of worthy representatives of the greatest port in the world it ought not to be impossible to do something to save London from the decline that was feared for it. It was true that so far they had held their own, but in matters of this kind it was absolutely necessary to be ahead of the times. He maintained that it should be the duty of a new authority to maintain the port up to the requirements of her trade, and he hoped they would hear from the President of the Board of Trade that it was the intention of the Government to deal with this matter with the boldness and completeness which its importance demanded.

Amendment proposed—

> "To leave out the word 'now' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day six months.'"—(Mr. Barnard.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*Sir E. BOYLE (Taunton) thought the last speaker was altogether mistaken in his view that the port dues of London were higher than those of other ports. The hon. Member had also said that £2,000,000 for the construction of a new dock was inadequate, but after careful consideration the promoters believed that it was every penny that would be required. In addition, the hon. Member had talked about a tax being levied under the Bill upon goods coming into London, but, of course, if one had to support docks, the money must be got from somewhere and the promoters thought it was fair that it should come from the goods which passed through the docks. The £7,000,000 estimate provided for much more than the construction of a dock; it also included the cost of widening and deepening the river and several other charges. The objects of the Bill were of such a character that he thought they would, to the mind of any unbiassed Member, bring more or less conviction as to its utility. There was nothing in the Bill that could be considered of an objectionable character. He was not going to read any of the clauses of the measure, because they were very lengthy, but he would summarise the more important ones as they stood as amended after interviews with the chief interests concerned. The Bill constituted the Thames Conservancy as the port authority, with duties to dredge the river, to regulate traffic on the river, and to collect port dues on ships and the new dues on goods. It gave the Board of Trade power to compel the dock companies to make any further and necessary improvements required by traders, and it left the dock companies as they were. But it put an obligation on the London and India Docks Company to construct at once a new dock and other works to cost £2,000,000, and on the other two companies and the London and India Docks Company to do whatever was necessary from time to time. It reduced the dues on ships from 1s. 6d. to 1s. per ton as recommended by the Royal Commission. Moreover it put dues on goods limited in amount by a schedule attached to the Bill. That again was the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission and was done at every other port except Hull. Coastwise transhipment and export goods were to be exempted. The schedule attached to the Bill, whether it was high or low, was the Liverpool schedule, and the Bill gave to traders an appeal to the Board of Trade and the Railway Commissioners on every port and dock charge, so getting over any question of the dues on goods being said to kill any manufactures or any trade by putting an exceptional charge upon them. These were the chief objects as set out in the Bill, and he was sure that there was no unbiassed and open-minded member of the commercial world who, after going through the measure, would find anything greatly to object to in it. It was true that it gave the London and India Docks Company power to levy dues on goods up to the amount of an annual payment rising to £270,000 in 1911 and thereafter. Why did it do that? It did it for the reason that the dock company undertook to spend £2,000,000, the amount which on the highest authority was said to be necessary, on a new dock; that sum would not be raised under 4 per cent., which equalled £80,000 a year. The dock must be a burden for many years until it came into full use; it could not be remunerative for twenty years at least, as a dock must be built far larger than present requirements, to meet future needs. Another reason was that the dock company were giving up 6d. per ton on dues on ships, and therefore that amount had to be got from somewhere. That 6d. per ton would amount to £150,000. In addition the dock company would have to pay increased rates and taxes and other outgoings on the new docks, and that would amount to £40,000 a year making a total of £270,000. This £270,000 which the Bill provided for would be gradually reduced as the new dock came into play, and in view of these figures it was a mistake for anyone to say that the Bill enriched the company. It did no such thing, but the port would get a new dock and the public further and better accommodation. The dock companies had no objection to being taken over by a board of trustees, they had no objection to being taken over by the London County Council or any other authority. All they said was that what had to be done in this direction should be done at once as time was of the greatest consequence. The effect of the adjournment of the question even for one year was to be deplored. If, at the end of that period, some method of purchase was provided for by the Board of Trade by means of a Port Trust, it would be two years before the proposal could be carried out. He took the precedent of the water companies, and said two years, because that period elapsed before they, after the passing of the measure, finally took over the undertakings of the water companies. With the year's delay, that made three years before anything could be done, and then it would take at least a year for the new authority to ascertain where was the best place to construct the new docks and to get out plans and specifications and make contracts for the building. If the Bill was not passed, therefore, it was practically impossible to relieve the pressure on the space of the docks till the year 1911. It must take four years. Supposing however, the dock companies were allowed to proceed with this Bill, they could start to get out their plans, specifications, and contracts next August, and there was no reason why the dock should not be open to receive ships in 1911. There was another reason why they should be allowed to proceed with the measure this session. The dock would be constructed in the poorest part of London, in the East End, and if they were allowed to commence it this year, the necessary work would give relief to thousands of working men in the district. The construction would last over this Christmas, next Christmas, and the Christmas after, and directly the work was completed the dock would give employment to thousands of people in the district in which it was most required. If the Bill passed it would do nothing whatever to stop a Port Trust or any other arrangement when the Government thought fit to bring it forward, with this advantage to the Government, that at any rate the maximum claim would be to some extent fixed, as the Bill would limit the dock companies to a dividend of 4 per cent. The dock companies had brought in a special sterilisation clause to that effect to meet the objection that their dividend would be unrestricted. He would not read the clause because it was a little long, but it was to the effect that they were willing to limit the return on the new capital, spent on the construction of the dock, to 4 per cent. for the next four years so as to give the Government time to take over the Dock undertaking. There did not seem to him to be anything very grasping in that proposal. They were willing, so as not to stop the necessities of the port being adapted to the requirements of the trade, to say, "Let us commence this dock; let us charge interest at 4 per cent. and you at any moment may step in and only pay us the cost of constructing the dock plus 4 per cent. on the money we have spent." He thought it must be admitted that the matter was urgent. In 1903, in the King's Speech, the necessity of dealing with the Port of London was referred to as a matter of "urgent national concern." They were now in 1907, and such was the urgency of the matter that the dock companies would be content to accept only this return of the money actually expended upon the new dock.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): Four per cent. on what?

*SIR E. BOYLE replied that it was 4 per cent. interest on the capital employed in constructing the new dock. He did not wonder at it striking the right hon. Gentleman as moderate. It was not 4 per cent. on the capital of the company, but 4 per cent. on the cost of the dock.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE asked where that was in the Bill. It did not appear from anything he was officially told in the Bill, which was what he was talking about. The only thing which he had officially was the document which he held in his hand, and the hon. and learned Gentleman had no right to refer to extraneous matters.

*SIR E. BOYLE said that, if the right hon. Gentleman would refer to the new clause which was to be added to the Bill, he would see that it set out what he had stated in no uncertain terms.

MR. ROWLANDS (Kent, Dartford) inquired in what part of the Bill it was to be inserted.

*SIR E. BOYLE said he did not know as he had not the Bill with him, but the new clause ran—

"If the undertaking of the company is purchased at any rate not later than four years from the passing of this Act, otherwise than by agreement, by any public body or trustees, the provisions of this Act shall not be taken into account in ascertaining the price or consideration to be paid by such body or trustees for the said undertaking. Provided that in the event of such purchase the company may bring into account the actual amount of any capital expenditure made by them in pursuance of the obligations imposed on them by or under this Act together with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the date of such expenditure."

Last year the Company brought in a Bill which would have assisted both themselves and the Millwall Docks, but they had to withdraw it because of the sterilisation clause that was insisted upon by the President of the Board of Trade, who said he would bring in a Bill this year. He knew how a sterilisation clause affected the claims of the Water Board, and he asked hon. Members who were business men whether they would submit to be put under a contract which meant "Heads I win and tails you lose." The returns of a dock company were not certain, but speculative. They depended on the trade. Let them imagine a dock company saying that if they earned 6 per cent. they would never accept more than 4 per cent., and if they earned nothing they would be content. If that sterilisation clause was put in it meant that the Bill would be thrown out. The present Bill had the support of the shipowners, merchants, and large timber trade of this country and other traders, but it was obvious that in a Bill of this magnitude it was impossible to please everybody. Somebody was bound to object. All he asked was that the Bill should be allowed to go forward, and that if it was just and beneficial it should be passed into law. If it was unjust let it be thrown out, but let the House not destroy it unheard with the sterilisation clause. If the Bill was allowed to go upstairs, if there were any objections they would be investigated, and if there was no substance in them they would be put on one side. During the last seven years the Company had spent £20,000 in bringing in Bills to obtain what they believed would be beneficial to the country and themselves. That was the position seven years ago when they were first seized of the necessity for the enlarging of the Port of London, not only for their benefit but for the benefit of the traders at that port. Since that date 1,200,000 tons more had come to the Port of London, and so far as the Company were concerned, they had no more area or facilities to offer now than then. Was there any other reason that should impress itself on the Government why they should give to the Company the relief they asked? Hon. Members would be somewhat surprised to know that at the present moment these great docks, the greatest in the world in one sense, did not possess an opening wide enough to admit battleships of the "Dreadnought" type, and that the Thames Shipbuilding Company lost the contract to build such ships because there was no dock in which they could be docked in the Port of London. To put it into colloquial language, that was bad business; bad for the port not to be able to accommodate such ships and bad for the State that the Thames shipbuilders were not able to contract for that size of vessel, because if they were constructed on the Thames there was no place in which to dock them. With our clear improving trade this was a really pressing subject, and the Company did not want to be put off with fair sounding terms and kindly wishes. They wanted to have a firm, clear, and definite promise that something would be done which would prevent the trade of the Port of London being injured and that the docks of London should no longer be restricted from making the full use of the natural advantages and magnificent premises they possessed. In 1905, that tonnage of the Port of London was 285,000,000, in this last year it was 314,000,000—an increase of 29,000,000, and the docks had no more facilities, no more advantages, to offer the public than in former years, and if the ships were too big they had to refuse them altogether. Things had arrived at such a pass that something must now be done. They had waited patiently and had been buffetted every way by one Government and another who had seen the necessity but done nothing, and if they were not now allowed to press this matter further the right hon. Gentleman ought to give some definite pledge that he would without further delay relieve the Docks Company from the unfair position in which they had been placed and take such steps as might be desirable for the improvement and protection of the Port.

MR. ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) said the House would appreciate that the question before them was of great magnitude and complexity, and also of the greatest possible urgency. He agreed with those who said that they wanted practical performance and not merely fair words. As a member of the Royal Commission that investigated this question for two years, he regretted that the 1903 Bill had not been passed into law. In the course of the inquiry no fact astonished him more than the volume of the trade of London, which was by far the greatest port in the world. There was no signs of diminution of trade, but proof of a steady increase in its volume, even since the Report of the Royal Commission had been issued. He would like to read one of the concluding paragraphs of the Report of the Commission which put the matter very clearly—

> "In conclusion we desire to say that our enquiry into the conditions of the Port of London has convinced us of its splendid natural advantages Among these are the geographical position of the Port; the magnitude, wealth and energy of the population behind it; the fine approach from the sea; the river tides strong enough to transport traffic easily to all parts, yet not so violent as to make navigation difficult; land along the shores of a character suitable for dock construction and all commercial purposes. In addition to these advantages, London possesses docks, which, although they are not in some cases upon the level of modern requirements, are yet capacious and capable of further development. The deficiencies of London as a Port, to which our attention has been called, are not due to any physical circumstances, but to causes which may easily be removed by a better organisation of administrative and financial powers."

While sympathising with the objects sought to be attained by the Bill, he could not agree with its methods. Clauses 25 to 38 relating to the constitution of the Thames Conservancy, were surely almost ultra vires; actually out of order they could not be, the Bill having been put from the Chair. Coming to the works proposed, they were urgently needed; everybody wanted the work done who knew anything of the circumstances of the case. He rather regretted to hear what had fallen from the hon. Member for Taunton with regard to the sterilisation clause. The omission of the Thames Conservancy clauses and the adoption of a reasonable sterilisation clause would be to his mind the ideally best course. But he dared say that his right hon. friend on looking carefully over the case had found himself not quite able to take that course, especially after what had fallen from the hon. Member. Therefore, it came to this, that, though the Bill had considerable merits, he did not suppose for a single moment that, having regard to the Report of the Royal Commission, and to the universal demand there was that the Thames should be placed as regarded the administrative authority in the same position as that occupied by some of our great rivers—the Government saw their way to allowing the Bill to be read a second time. The President of the Board of Trade would speak for the Government of course, and he earnestly urged him not merely to make a promise or to say a few fair words, but to bind himself by a Parliamentary pledge to introduce a Bill dealing with the whole subject next year. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's, Hanover Square, who was the one other Member of the House on the Royal Commission, permitted him to speak on his behalf. The rignt hon. Gentleman wrote to him as follows:—

> "I think the delay in putting through the improvements of the port which we recommended is deplorable. In my opinion the docks ought not to be impeded in legislation, appropriate to their powers and constitution, except on a distinct pledge by the Government themselves to pass a Bill next year."

It was purely a non-political and business matter. Following the precedent of 1903, the Bill could go to a Joint Committee, and it would come back from that Committee in such a position that the Government would be able to put it through. He did most earnestly hope that they would have a Parliamentary pledge from his right hon. friend of the nature he had indicated.

*Mr. WILES (Islington, S.) said he desired to support the rejection of the Bill for two reasons. First of all, because the Bill seemed to him one of the most astounding proposals that had ever been put before Parliament; and, in the second place, because he felt that the dock companies of London, in the days that they had been handling the trade of the port, had failed in their trust to the people and commerce of London. The Bill was opposed by all the organised trades of London. Shippers, sugar merchants, metal merchants, those engaged in the grain and flour trade, and those connected with the whole of the riverside warehouses, were all opposed to the Bill and with no uncertain voice. He believed it was understood that the Bill was promoted by all the dock companies of London, but really he thought that it was promoted by the London and India Dock Joint Committee. He believed that that Committee managed the Albert and Victoria Dock, the West India Dock and the Tilbury Dock Companies had some working agreement with the Millwall Dock Company, and the Commercial Dock Company he thought only gave a half-hearted support to the measure. The latter was the only dock, he believed, which had been managed in an efficient and business-like manner, and the only dock company which paid a dividend and had given satisfaction to the traders of London. The proposal of the Bill was to put a tax on all goods which came into London from over the sea. Further, it proposed to put a tax upon barges that were obliged to enter the docks to take goods off steamers. As far as he could see very little advantage was going to be given to the merchants and traders of London in exchange for the tax to be put upon goods. The only advantage suggested was that a new dock was to be built at a cost of something like two millions of money. He thought that it was a great question whether the new dock was required in London. What Londoners and merchants and shippers required was that the present dock accommodation should be brought to a perfect condition by the introduction of modern machinery; that, he believed, would give satisfaction. If the Bill passed, a tax would be put on the raw material of all the manufactures and industries of the River Thames, simply, he believed, to enable the dock companies to make better dividends, and perhaps very few, if any, facilities would be given for delivery and despatch in the management of the docks. He spoke with rather bitter experience of the dock companies. He had been in business in the City for twenty-five years, and he knew that everyone who had brought a large amount of goods through the docks had always found that London was in a worse position than the other great ports of the country. Especially was the trade of London hampered by the management, or he might say, very often the mismanagement of the docks of the Joint Committee. The grain trade, with which he was acquainted, was perhaps the largest trade that passed through the docks of London, and it was the one which had suffered particularly. A few years ago London not only supplied the great district of the Home Counties, but she also a large through trade with the Midlands. London had lost that trade very largely, because buyers said that the delay was so great when they bought in London, the weights so irregular, and they never knew what charges would be made by the dock companies. They said that they would rather buy from Liverpool, Hull, or Bristol, because those ports took pride in the management of their docks, and the docks at none of those ports were managed by private enterprise. The London dock companies had long realised the tremendous consumption of the growing districts of the Home Counties and of the districts around London, and they thought, he supposed, that they had a monopoly of that tremendous trade. But in the last few years the ports of Harwich and Southampton had grown up like mushrooms, and they had made great competition with the traders of London. In those two ports, especially in Harwich, the working-out charges were very light indeed. In London it cost 1s. 9d. to work grain from a steamer into lighters; in Harwich they could work it for 10d. or 1s. a ton, leaving a profit to the contractors. When representations were made to the London dock companies about these disadvantages, what happened? Unfortunately the dock companies were unable to obtain more capital; so they fell back upon the old resource of making subsidiary companies. The Millwall Dock Company had to form the Millwall Equipment Company; they had more directors, more shareholders, more expenses in connection with that subsidiary company. They divided the 1s. 9d. a ton profit with the old dock company. It was the same with the Victoria Dock Company. The Victoria Dock Company, he supposed, could not raise money for the new machinery which was required, and so they also formed a subsidiary company called the Grain Elevator Company, which worked the trade and divided the profit. He believed that if these dock companies were to work themselves, the goods would be worked out of the vessels easily for 10d. or 1s. a ton. But now, instead of merchandise being worked out cheaper, they proposed to put a heavy tax on all goods entering into London. What the people of the Port of London wanted were cheaper working-out charges instead of the higher charges which the dock companies proposed to put on. These tariff reformers. as he might call them, were not satisfied with putting a tax on food that came into London, but they also proposed to put a tax on barges which carried the food. He thought that London had suffered long enough at the hands of these dock companies and syndicates, and he was convinced that the proposal in the Bill was the worst that could be made for the trade and interests of the people of London. He trusted that the President of the Board of Trade, with his great knowledge and ability, would before very long bring forward a better scheme, in order to deal with the whole question. It was a matter of great regret to the merchants and traders of London that the Bill of 1903 was not carried through. Why it was dropped nobody could ever understand. Whether the Government of the day were afraid of the dock directors who were then in Parliament, or whether they were afraid of the Lord Mayor, who opposed that Bill, he did not know. He felt sure the right hon. Gentleman would fear neither dock director nor Lord Mayor, but would bring forward a satisfactory measure which would help forward the trade of the Port of London.

Mr. W. F. D. SMITH (Strand, Westminster) said that this was not a Party question. The late Government introduced a Bill during the last Parliament dealing with the question. The right hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division had stated that he was not quite sure whether the clause dealing with the reconstitution of the Thames Conservancy Board was in order. He wished to point out that that Board held its powers under a private Act passed in 1894, and therefore such a proposal to amend its constitution was within the limits of order.

Mr. ELLIS said what he said was that it must have been in order or it would not have been introduced.

Mr. W. F. D. SMITH said the company could not be blamed for introducing the Bill. They were, he believed, given to understand that in the present session of Parliament the Government would introduce a Bill dealing with the whole subject, and delay in dealing with the question would be most unwarrantable. At the present moment they were no better off than when the Royal Commission reported in 1902. That Report was followed by the introduction of the Bill of 1903, and all who took an interest in the question knew that that Bill had to be withdrawn because it seemed impossible to reconcile those who were in various ways interested in its provisions. He agreed that the withdrawal of that Bill was unfortunate, but under the circumstances he did not think that the Government could have forced it through the House. It was true that since that time the trade of the Port of London had not decreased in the manner predicted by the Royal Commission; during the past few years it had increased, and last year there was a record increase. But that fact, far from suggesting any reason for further delay, seemed to him to be an additional reason for immediate action, because if the accommodation in the Port of London was insufficient in the year 1902 it must be infinitely more insufficient in the year 1907 when the trade had greatly increased. There was at this moment the added advantage that the chances of coming to some agreement amongst the various interests concerned were brighter than they had ever been before. If the President of the Board of Trade could bring together all those interested he would be deserving of their congratulations. As a supporter of the Bill introduced by the last Government he did not for a moment go against the recommendation of the Royal Commission which reported in 1902, but at the same time he wished to state that he saw much danger in any further delay. If the subject was not dealt with now there might be a delay of several years, whereas if this Bill were passed the new docks might be commenced at once. He could well understand that the Government did not desire to prejudice in any way their future action, and if they intended to deal with the whole subject no doubt they would desire to keep a free hand. He would like to know whether it was possible for the Government to allow this Bill to pass and at the same time preserve their own freedom of action. Would it not be possible to place in the Bill some safeguarding provision which would leave the Government perfectly free to act and introduce their own Bill next year? He was anxious that in some way or other it should be made possible for the work to be commenced this year. That was a point which might very well be considered, and he hoped that before the right hon. Gentleman replied he would make up his mind upon it. What he was sure all sections of the House desired was to see the question settled, because they were all anxious that the accommodation of the Port of London should be increased and improved as soon as possible.

*SIR A. SPICER (Hackney, Central) said he agreed that this was not a Party question, and he took no exception to what had been said as to its urgency. Speaking as one who had been connected with the commerce of London for a great many years, and speaking in the name of the large body of traders represented by the London Chamber of Commerce, he desired to say a few words in opposition to the Bill. The measure was promoted by private companies, who were asking Parliament to impose new burdens on traders, primarily for their own benefit. It was a much larger question than could be dealt with by private companies. More than half the tonnage that came into the Port of London did not use the docks at all, but was dealt with by private wharfowners and the waterside manufacturers. The waterside manufacturers alone represented a capital of £100,000,000, whereas the whole capital of the dock companies amounted to only £24,320,000. These manufacturers had invested that large capital on the strength of free water privileges—privileges which existed before the docks were created, and were safeguarded by Parliament when the docks were sanctioned. It had been said that the shipowners had agreed to the Bill, but it was only the owners of ocean-going ships who were supporting it, and their attitude was very natural, because under it their dues would be lessened. He regretted that the last Government's Bill was not passed, and those who represented London at that time had a great responsibility on their shoulders for the pressure they brought to bear on the Government of the day to drop it. All delay was bad for London. The sphere of influence connected with London, the trade of which must be done practically in the Port of London, was constantly increasing. They must also bear in mind that there was a large class of trade which, if London did not provide for the ships thoroughly up-to-date facilities, drifted not to other British ports but to distributing ports like Hamburg and Antwerp. That trade, having once drifted away, was very difficult to regain. The question was complicated by a variety of competitive interests, but they had to remember that the consumer of the daily necessaries of life was also deeply concerned. The manufacturing industry of London was the largest in the Kingdom. It was split up into an enormous number of specialities. All these varied interests could only be dealt with by a Bill introduced by the Government trying to deal fairly with them. He sincerely hoped that one good result from the discussion would be that the President of the Board of Trade would be able to assure them that there would be no delay in bringing in a Bill. It would not be easy to satisfy all Parties, but for himself he hoped there would be set up a port authority, representative of all interests, which should take over the docks, not by purchase under arbitration terms, but by negotiation, with the understanding that the present proprietors of the docks should be placed in a position neither better nor worse than they occupied at the present time.

*MR. W. PEARCE (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) said he was glad that this question had been kept free from the atmosphere of Party. He looked upon a wise solution of the Port of London question as being a most important matter in London's immediate welfare. The present Bill, had, to his mind, two fundamental objections—objections which, he hoped, the Government would be able to avoid. The first was that it continued to rely on private enterprise; and, secondly, it threw the whole cost of the improvement as a burden upon trade. Those objections were both avoided by London's greatest rivals on the Continent. In judging of this question they must remember that it was the Continental ports which were the rivals of London. It was those ports which had been the latest successes, and it was from them that something was to be learned. In none of the Continental ports did they entrust these duties to private enterprise, and in none of them was the whole burden imposed on trade. In every one there had been large contributions from Imperial or local funds. It was no wonder, therefore, that the Royal Commission made this recommendation, in Paragraph 232, of their Report—

> "The power of undertaking large present expenditure and of working for a long time at a loss with a view to compensation in a distant future is, in the keen world competition, an advantage possessed by undertakings which have the force of an empire, state, or great city behind them. If, in some countries national and municipal resources are thus employed, it becomes most difficult for private enterprise elsewhere to hold its own against the intelligent, far-sighted, and formidable rivalry thus created."

Many who had been considering the question had seen the great difficulty of acquiring the docks and the whole of the undertaking because of the large price it would be necessary for the public to pay. He had wondered whether it would not be possible to remove the conduct of the port from the hands of private enterprise, and at the same time not to throw an enormous burden on trade. There appeared now to be pretty general agreement that the pressing necessities of the port were, first, a 35 feet deep channel from the Nore to Gravesend, and a 30 feet deep channel from Gravesend to the Albert Dock; and secondly, new deep water docks 40 to 45 feet deep with entrance locks 900 to 1,000 feet, and dry docks of equal size, Until these new docks had been established London would be unable to accommodate the large ships of to-day. It could not at present dock the "Dreadnought," and unless the improvements were made it would not be able to take in the large ships which in future were going to do the commerce of the world. Neither of these needs was met by the Dock Companies' Bill. The first was the duty of the Conservancy, and the second was beyond the companies' powers and resources. On the other hand both could be performed by a revised Conservancy, having powers to spend £5,000,000. That sum should be raised on a Government guarantee, interest secured by an increase of the tonnage dues of ½d. and ¾d. on registered tonnage, now doubled for three years for a similar purpose. It could not be urged that such Conservancy Docks would be unfair to the existing docks, for they would serve a special purpose for very large ships, new and additional, and would not therefore compete for the same class of business. In that way it was possible to escape from the present dilemma, the necessity of changing from private enterprise to public authority by purchasing the whole undertaking of the dock companies. The purchase could only be made at a figure prohibitive of commercial success, and it would saddle the public with a bargain of the worst description. A dock system, over capitalised, not up to date, administered by a new authority without full experience, would bring discredit to all concerned. Moreover, a heavy burden on the trade of the port would be avoided, for his proposed increase in tonnage rates was very much less onerous than a general rate on all goods imported.

MR. BOWLES (Lambeth, Norwood) said the hon. Member for Limehouse had based his opposition to the Bill on the fact that its adoption would have the effect of handing over the Port of London to private enterprise. It seemed to him that the hon. Member entirely misundertood the very grave and urgent situation in which they now found themselves. The situation was simply this. Five years ago the Royal Commission reported that the question was urgent. There was nobody who had an interest in, or knowledge of, the trade of London who would not agree that this was really a matter of the gravest importance and urgency. It was perfectly intolerable that, owing to the failure of successive Governments, urgent and necessary improvements should be denied to London, the greatest port in the world.

The hon. Member for St. George's (Tower Hamlets) had said that the Bill imposed new dues. That was perfectly true. They could not have new facilities without new expenses, The hon. Member had also said that this was taking public money for the benefit of private companies. Did the hon. Gentleman know where this "public money" was coming from? Was money derived from a private dock company acting in their own interest what he called "public money?"

*MR. W. BENN said the Bill proposed to put an entirely new charge on the trade of the Port of London. That was what he meant by "public money."

MR. BOWLES said he denied that the money so raised would be in a real sense public money. But all these were points eminently for consideration by a Private Bill Committee upstairs. It was quite idle to expect the House to consider the technical matters involved in this measure with any real advantage. The question was whether, if the Government was unable to find time to deal with the matter itself, there should be another year's delay. On a former occasion the President of the Board of Trade said four things. Everybody, he said, was dissatisfied with the present state of things; that everybody was agreed that the matter was of real and genuine urgency; that what was wanted was primarily dock extension; and, finally, that there should be one authority to manage the Port of London, and that that authority ought to be a public authority. There was nothing in this Bill inconsistent with any one of those four requirements. It was the only attempt they were likely to see in the present year to deal with this important problem, and he thought that the House would be taking a very serious responsibility on itself if, for reasons which had not been avowed, inquiry by a Committee upstairs were refused. This was a great free trade Government, but he would remind hon. Members that there were other hindrances to trade than tariffs, and that a very serious responsibility would be incurred if the House and Government permanently refused to the London dock companies the power to spend money on the development of the Port of London which everybody admitted should be spent. He had no interest in the matter except as a London Member, and he believed that the trade of London would suffer more and more unless this Bill received a Second Reading. Therefore, he hoped the President of the Board of Trade would not allow any mere pique to prevent that Second Reading being taken unless he had some real and grave reasons for denying it.

*MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland) said he did not see why the Dock Company should be allowed extended powers, and the reason was that they took the shareholders' money and spent it for Party purposes in London elections and were not ashamed. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh, oh."] He had brought up the same question in the case of a Bill promoted by the London and North Western Railway Company. The House would agree with him that he would be acting inconsistently and putting himself under suspicion of favouritism if he did not ask the House to treat all companies in the same manner. On that occasion he, and the House agreed with him, thought that the railway company had done wrong; but the dock company did worse, because in the former case the directors humbly admitted their error to the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not in order in referring to debates in the same session.

*MR. TREVELYAN said that in the case of the Dock Company it was apparent from a letter which appeared in the papers that the company had entered into a complete and systematic policy of subsidising local elections in London. That appeared to him to be a practical defiance of the views of the House. The letter to which he referred was written in answer to an inquiry by the President of the Board of Trade in regard to the matter. In the letter which had been printed in The Times, and was circulated in the Votes for that day, the London and India Docks Company stated that the reason why they gave a subscription to the London Municipal Society was to aid the endeavours of that society "to return members at the recent municipal and guardian elections pledged to economy in local administration." The company went on to point out that they had been acting on this principle for some time, and had subscribed to the West Ham Borough Alliance and Poplar Borough Alliance. And the company further stated that it was because of the success of these alliances at West Ham and Poplar elections that the directors welcomed the efforts of the London Municipal Society in the same direction to secure economy. Of course their operations might have been very successful in the case of Poplar. [An Hon. Member: But not in West Ham.] But supposing, for the moment, that it was true that the exposure of the abuses at Poplar was of great advantage to the public; supposing for the moment that it was true that it was not the activity of the Local Government Board under its present head, but that of the political Party called the Moderate Party which was the sole agency that had brought to light these abuses—it was a very poor Party which did not do something good in the course of its existence—apart from all that, this was a Party organisation, and the dock companies had been helping it. It was the assistance given to a Party which they objected to in regard to dock companies. He doubted whether the House would pass the Bill of a company which gloried in having subscribed to a Party organisation and declared by letter its intention of doing so unless it was absolutely prevented. He thought the House would feel that the matter had become serious, and he hoped the Government would have something to say either on this or some other occasion to prevent this state of things by bringing forward legislation. But, whether the Government were prepared to bring forward legislation of that sort or not, it appeared that the House had before them an unrepentant company and, in his opinion, they ought to take the opportunity of teaching it a lesson. He hoped the House would take that view, as the sooner they got a public authority which did not dabble in politics the better. Until they did get such an authority he hoped the House would not grant any further powers to companies which had taken such action.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) thought the point of view of the hon. Gentleman was admirably illustrated by the last phrase which he used, that he desired to teach this Company a lesson. [Opposition cheers and Ministerial counter cheers.] He was not surprised to find that that was a fair sample of the opinion of the bulk of the Liberal Party. Let them see exactly what the Dock Company had done. He thought it would be for the advantage of the debate if he read the letter, which the President of the Board of Trade had published that morning, written on behalf of the London and India Docks Company. That letter was the whole of the knowledge he possessed on the subject and gave the actual facts of the case. The letter was as follows——

Sir,—The directors have had before them your letter of the 12th instant. They have no objection to stating that they subscribed £100 to the funds of the London Municipal Society in December last, and they are advised that under the judgment given by the Court of Appeal on November 19th, 1906, the contribution was a perfectly legal one.

Their reason for giving the subscription was to aid the endeavours of the London Municipal Society to return members at the recent municipal and guardian elections pledged to economy in local administration.

The Company, like all proprietors of industrial undertakings in and near London, have suffered grievously from the excessive local rates levied upon them. Rates have been increasing for many years past, and there has been no remedy open to the Company in the municipality itself, for although they pay a large proportion of the rates in every locality in which their docks are situated, they have absolutely no voice in the election of the persons who spend their money.

The only course open to the Company, therefore, is to support reputable organisations which are founded to educate voters as to the peril to them of the increase of municipal burdens and to expose the mismanagement of particular local institutions. Acting on this principle my directors have subscribed to the West Ham Borough Alliance and the Poplar Borough Alliance. Both of these alliances have been remarkably successful in the work, and it may be within the knowledge of the Board of Trade that they have been active agents in bringing to light the notorious scandals which have been the subject of recent official inquiry in these two boroughs; indeed in the case of the inquiry into the administration of the Poor Law at Poplar the alliance was officially recognised by the Local Government Board's representative as the body chiefly responsible for proving the charges made against the guardians. In Poplar alone, as a result of the action taken by the alliance, there will be savings in expenditure at the rate of £70,000 a year, which will be shared by the whole of the ratepayers of the borough.

It was because of the success achieved at Poplar and West Ham that the directors welcomed the efforts of the London Municipal Society to apply to those matters in which London as a whole is concerned the same reforming energy which has been applied locally at Poplar and West Ham.

The directors observe that it has been charged against the London Municipal Society that it is a political organisation. No ground for such a charge is to be found either in the rules or the statement of objects of the society. No political test for membership is imposed; and as a fact there are persons belonging to both the Unionist and Liberal Parties amongst its members, and on the council is Sir F. Schuster, who was the Liberal candidate for the City of London at the last general election.

The directors, amongst whom are adherents of both sides of politics, would certainly not continue their support to the society if they had any reason to believe that its aims were political; but no evidence has come before them to show that there has been any conduct on the part of its managers which indicates a departure from the spirit of its constitution.

That was the defence of the London and India Docks Company. The charge of subscribing to a political object was dealt with in the letter, and if it was a technical charge it was sufficiently met by the Company's observation that they had been advised that under the decision of the Court of Appeal they were well within their rights in the action they had taken. He therefore did not rest his observations on any technical ground but went to the larger and more substantial objection which he understood was raised. The objection raised was to the existence of trusts, to the power of money being used to affect political elections. That was the real charge which lay at the basis of this question. He was one of the last to deny that the power of money so used was a serious danger to democracies in all parts of the world. But the danger was not confined to companies. It was as great in the case of private individuals. In fact it was greater, because statutory companies were compelled to publish accounts, and if any money was used for these purposes it could be traced on those accounts. He had had a short experience of the House but a lengthy experience in Private Bill Committees, and he submitted that the practice of utilising the procedure on private Bills to forward objects not connected with those Bills ought to be very carefully watched. He protested against the practice. Where the action was private no one would defend it, but when it was political it was a very dangerous weapon to use. He hoped the House would not countenance this attempt to achieve a political end, whether good or bad, by supporting an Amendment which would put an end to a Bill intended to forward a wholly different object, and which had nothing whatever to do with political corruption or the maintenance or otherwise of the Progressive Party.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE) said he would rather not enter on the questions raised by the two last speakers and he did not propose to put the action of the Government on this Bill on the ground suggested by his hon. friend the Member for the Elland Division. He could not agree that this was the case of a private company entitled to do what it liked with its own assets. It was the case of a company which owed its existence to Parliament, which had a Parliamentary monopoly, and whose revenue depended on privileges and powers conferred by Parliament, coming now and asking for power to levy tolls outside its own territory in order to pay a dividend of 4 or 5 per cent. where it was now paying nothing. The noble Lord, in reading the letter of the London Dock Company, said there was no political test for membership of the London Municipal Society.

LORD R. CECIL: I was merely reading the letter.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that was the claim put forward by the dock company, but he believed it was also put forward by the Tariff Reform League. He would like to know from the noble Lord if in his opinion the Tariff Reform League was not a political organisation. It would be rather interesting to get his view.

LORD R. CECIL said he was the last person in the world to apply to for information about the Tariff Reform League.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that was the very reason why he had asked the noble Lord—because he thought the noble Lord was the last person in the world to endorse that claim. The noble Lord with regard to the Tariff Reform League had acted fairly and with impartiality of judgment, and he only asked that that fairness and impartiality of judgment should be extended to the operations of the London Municipal Society. He would rather discuss the Bill altogether apart from that question, because he wanted the House to believe that the action of the Government had not been dictated or inspired in the slightest degree by any notions they might hold with regard to the subscriptions of great corporations in receipt of Parliamentary powers. He would deal with the merits of the Bill itself. He did not believe that the supporters really anticipated that it would go through the House. On the contrary, he believed that it had been introduced simply for the purpose of raising a discussion on the whole question, and with that object in view he thought that perhaps they had rendered a public service, although he thought that it might have been done at much less expense by bringing on a Motion than by promoting a Bill. The Government could not possibly give support to the Second Reading of this measure. If the Bill were carried it would enable these private companies to levy a toll upon practically all goods that came into the Thames. They contemplated that out of the revenue thus raised they should receive a dividend in respect of one company of 4 per cent., of another 6 per cent., and of a third 4 per cent. The first of these companies was at present earning about 2¼ per cent., the second 5 per cent., and the third had not for at least six or seven years paid a penny in dividend. He did not think the House could possibly contemplate carrying a Bill which would have the effect of placing a permanent burden on the trade of London for the purpose of providing for these companies the dividends which he had mentioned.

Sir E. BOYLE said that the company which paid no dividend was a very small one.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE said that was the old plea, that it was only a very little one. The Millwall Company was only a small one, he agreed, but still that was the general proposition which he stated. The companies had never proposed to eliminate Clause 18 from this Bill. That would have been a totally different proposal. They meant to adhere to Clause 18, and the only thing they proposed was that, as far as the new dock was concerned, it should be valued on the basis of a 4 per cent. dividend. The next consideration was well known to them, that if they put in a provision of that kind it would be practically guaranteeing a dividend of 4 per cent. in the Bill, and the hon. and learned Gentleman well knew that any arbitrator would take that into account, with the result that the value of the docks in London would be increased. Therefore, the hon. and learned Gentleman, as far as he was concerned, had not affected the general character of the argument Another point with regard to the Bill was that it had not the support of the trades of London at all. The Chamber of Commerce were against it, the riverside manufacturers were against it, the grain and flour people were against it, and so were the timber trade. It was true the shipping trade at first, induced by a probable reduction of 6d. per ton, gave a kind of qualified assent to it, but they subsequently withdrew that, and now they trusted the Government would see that something was done to improve the Port of London. But that was not supporting the Bill proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, whose measure would have no effect in improving the Port of London. In these circumstances, the Government had come to the conclusion, after most careful consideration, that they could not possibly support the Second Reading of the Bill, which, if passed, would unfortunately have the effect of embarrassing the Government when they came to deal with the question. The Bill, if the docks were purchased, would give them an artificial value by conferring on the dock companies these powers.

Sir E. BOYLE was understood to say that the right to 4 per cent. as to the new dock only lasted four years, and as to the whole of the rest of the docks the Bill made no difference.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he did not agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman at all; and he said so after very careful consideration with those who advised him as to the whole effect of the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman knew perfectly well that, in a Bill of this kind, to increase Parliamentary powers, to increase the revenues to the extent of hundreds of thousands of pounds a year, when the property at the present moment was not in a very solvent condition, and when one company could not pay a dividend to its ordinary shareholders—

SIR E. BOYLE: No, no!

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said the hon. and learned Gentleman must really let him finish his sentence. As far as one dock company was concerned it had paid no dividend; as far as another dock was concerned it had paid only 2¼ per cent. and had been paying 1¼ per cent.; and as far as the other dock was concerned it was paying 5 per cent. With any Bill of this kind giving Parliamentary powers, and increasing the revenues to the extent of hundreds of thousands a year, surely the hon. and learned Gentleman, with his experience, must know that it would enormously increase the security and the real value, as a marketable asset, of the whole concern. Therefore when the Government had before them the prospect of having to deal with the whole problem of the port of London, it must take into account all questions of this kind, which might have an appreciable effect in connection with the introduction of a Bill. Therefore, when the Government had before them the prospect of dealing with the whole problem of the port of London they must be influenced by these considerations, and would not be justified, for the sake of one year, in supporting a Bill of this kind, which might eventually embarrass them very considerably in the settlement of the whole problem. Probably that answer would not be considered quite sufficient. He agreed that the Government ought to deal with the subject as soon as possible, and he was authorised to say, on their behalf, that it was their intention to deal effectively with the problem in the course of the next session of Parliament. It could not be done this session, because the Standing Order required that notices should be given in November. He knew he said something not quite so definite last year, and he thought it might have been done even this year if there had been the slightest prospect of getting any general agreement among the parties interested. He had seen representatives of every one of the interests concerned, but it appeared hopeless to expect agreement. He had met representatives of the waterside manufacturers, the Corporation of London the Thames Conservancy Board, the London County Council, and others interested and there was not one deputation which agreed with another, there were no two men on the same deputation who agreed, and as far as the Thames Conservancy was concerned the moment one man made a proposal his neighbour got up and repudiated it on the spot. That was the nature of the problem with which he had to deal, and he did not think there was a more difficult problem to deal with even in Ireland. He denied the statement which had been made that this was an easy problem to deal with, because the various interests concerned were far from coming to any common basis of agreement. He did not know whether there was any probability of coming to an agreement before November, but if no solution was arrived at by that time the Government would suggest the best course, taking into account all the circumstances of the case. Some things had emerged out of the controversies, and two or three things must be regarded as part of the necessary basis in any general treatment of the subject. The objects to be attained were agreed upon. There must be further port facilities, a deepening and widening of the channel an improvement in the accommodation for berthing, discharging, collecting, and distributing. These were objects upon which there would be general agreement. The second consideration was that it must be dealt with by a public port authority. They could not leave the problem to any private company; there must be one public authority dealing with the whole problem of the port. At the present time he was told that there were over fifty authorities which had some kind of finger in the pie. There ought to be an end to all that. The third consideration was that the trend of public opinion was against having the control of the river given to any individual municipality. In his judgment that involved as a necessary corollary that no single municipality should have a majority of the representatives on that public authority. The other proposition he laid down was that the general public must be represented apart from the payers of dues, for he did not think that the public authority ought to consist exclusively of representatives of those who paid tolls and dues in the Thames. The best means of securing the representation of the general public was by means of nominations of Government departments and the municipalities concerned. Opinion also seemed to be hardening against the compulsory purchase of the docks. He was expressing no opinion on the subject; he was merely pointing out that there seemed to be a growing opinion in that direction, a growing tendency to protest against the idea that the docks must be purchased compulsorily. It was said that compulsory purchase inevitably meant that they paid twice as much for a thing as it was worth, and the traders said that if more was paid for a thing than it was worth it would always be a burden on the trade of London, for some one had to pay for it, and the effect would be to increase the charges in the river and make the port of London more expensive than at present, without obtaining an adequate return for the outlay. After all, when they came to settle the problem the interest of London must be the paramount consideration, and not the interest of any private company. There was capital which had been invested in the docks 100 years ago, a good deal of it dead capital, capital which would have been wiped out long ago by a municipal sinking fund. Those docks were purely and simply private enterprise, which had paid high dividends for over twenty years, but they had neglected to make provision for a sinking fund which would have wiped out most of their capital long ago. Surely they were not justified in coming forward now and asking that they should be paid back the whole of that money. That would be imposing a burden on the port of London which would not in the slightest degree bear comparison with that on Continental ports. He did not think that ought to be allowed in any Government Bill. The next point which he would like to state for the consideration of those who would have to give their opinion eventually upon the best method of dealing with the port was this: To secure the necessary improvements some dues on goods or ships, probably on both, would be required, and he believed that traders were prepared at least in principle to accept that necessity. He did not think they would agree to anything like the Liverpool scale of charges. There was a pretty strong feeling expressed by all the traders who came before him that the Liverpool schedule of charges was too high, but he thought every section was prepared to contribute something. The only condition raised by many traders was that the dues should not be used for the purchase of docks, but for the purpose of improving the river. A good deal had been said in the debate about a Government subsidy, but the Government could not hold out any hope of any subsidy being given to the port of London. It was said that the Imperial Government had contributed a considerable sum of money to the competing port of Hamburg. But in Germany they had only two or three ports of any consequence, while in the United Kingdom we had six times as many ports to deal with. If a Government subsidy were to be given to the Port of London, then Newcastle, Liverpool—where it was proposed to spend many millions of money—Bristol, Cardiff, and all the other great ports of the United Kingdom would want their fair share of Government contributions. Whether the London County Council or the Corporation of London would see their way to contribute anything was a different matter. It was not for him to lay down any proposition on that point, it was purely a question for the London County Council and the Corporation to think out for themselves. He trusted they would not decide the matter in a hurry, but that before the Government gave notice of their proposals they would be able to make up their minds to assist in the matter. If the port was to be an effective competitor with the great Continental ports, millions of money must be spent in deepening the channel and improving the facilities, especially for discharging and distributing cargoes. The facilities at Antwerp and Hamburg were the means of an enormous saving of time, and the equipments there were superior. To effect such improvements as these was the only way in which the end desired could be achieved, and it was because he felt that any effective method of dealing with the problem would be embarrassed by the carrying of this Bill that he invited the House to throw it out.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said the President of the Board of Trade had asked the House to reject the Bill on the ground that the Government was going to introduce a Bill on the subject next session. Was the Government Bill to be an alternative to this measure? He understood from the right hon. Gentleman that the Government Bill would recognise the fact that no municipal authority should be the body entrusted with the affairs and fortunes of the Port of London.

WAYS AND MEANS.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL [H.L.].

[Second Reading].

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Loreburn): My Lords, this is a Bill to which I apprehend there will be no opposition, because it is in accordance with a series of its predecessors the object of which has been to revise and, if possible, simplify the statute law. If this Bill passes, I hope it will lead to the edition being carried down to the end of the last century, which is nearly co-terminus with the end of the reign of Her late Majesty. The work has been conducted with great care and very successfully handled by the noble Earl who preceded me on the Woolsack. I hope this useful work of revision will be continued.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD ASHBOURNE: My Lords, I should like to say a few words in reference to this Bill, but not in the least to oppose it. The work was inaugurated many years ago, and has been satisfactorily carried out. The Committee selected for this purpose is, of course, composed of eminent men in whom complete reliance is placed, but in the nature of things, as will be seen from a glance at the enormous Schedule of this Bill, a great amount of drudgery is required and a great deal of attentive and minute examination of a vast number of Acts of Parliament. It could not possibly be expected that the eminent personages on the Committee would themselves, in the first instance, wade through all this mass of material, and I therefore assume that others, who will work under their directions, must be entrusted with the initial duty of examining the statutes. I would venture to express a hope that the gentlemen chosen for this work will be men whose avocations and studies have led them to acquire a mastery of the reading of Acts of Parliament, and that nothing will be done lightly or hastily.

I have no doubt that in the main what the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has said is entirely correct, that the work has been done with accuracy and care; but in the very nature of things it is inevitable that there must occasionally be mistakes. Therefore it is obviously essential that the most extreme care should be taken in the selection of those who are given the primary duty of examination. That is a matter to which I have no doubt the noble and learned Lord will give attention. I would like to know whether in the selection of the gentlemen who are to give assistance to the Committee there is any division of labour, and whether the different classes of work are considered. I am more closely associated with Ireland, and I would suppose that someone acquainted by training and knowledge with Irish laws would be employed in reference to the revision of statutes relating to Ireland. The same remark would apply to Scotland. It would also be desirable to secure that statutes relating to important branches of the law should be read in the first instance by someone with special knowledge. That, I think, is an obvious consideration which would suggest itself to the mind of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack.

I am aware that the introductory words of the revised edition of the statutes are very wide as to savings and exceptions, and it is not easy to say what is the effect and how far the repeal and revision really operates at present in law. In the full and interesting note which is appended to this Bill it is pointed out that regard is to be had to Acts of Parliament that are superseded and are deemed to be obsolete and so on. But then there is the suggestion that preambles and recitals are to be left out. I am not sure how far that is wise. It may be wise in some cases, but I do not think it is wise in every case to lay down the rule that you will not in any circumstances print the preambles or recitals. They might be very useful in discussion, it might be desired to refer to them in argument, and they might reasonably be used to elucidate the history of the statutes. It is a matter of great importance that the code of law should be shortened, and I am confident that the noble and learned Lord will apply himself to see that the revised edition proposed in this Bill is brought out in the most satisfactory and useful way.

There is one other point on which I should like to say a word. Judges, barristers, and others connected with the law find it a matter of great inconvenience in some cases that there is no reference at all in the revised edition to clauses that are omitted, and this necessitates in the case of many important statutes referring to the original Act to see what clauses have been left out. I venture to think it would be a great advantage in many cases if the more important clauses that are omitted could be included, with an intimation in red ink that they had been repealed. These are not matters easy to accomplish, but I think the effort is worth something.

The Earl of HALSBURY: My Lords, I think I ought to say that for a good many years this work of revision went on under my supervision, and I have no reason to suppose any different method is being pursued now. Certain expert persons, amongst them very distinguished lawyers, were employed to see what the statutes were which it was intended either to consolidate or to put into form; they were persons in the habit of preparing Bills brought into Parliament on behalf of the Government. After they had prepared their suggestions, a Committee was summoned to consider the suggestions, and each amendment to each statute was looked at with great care. No statute was subjected to revision or amendment without being distinctly brought before the whole Committee, which sometimes included learned Judges and sometimes Members of the other House.

The work of the Committee afterwards came before the House as this Bill does to-night. One result of the work has been that statutes which formerly were in 110 volumes were reduced into ten volumes. Of course I am speaking of the same editions and the same print. The effect of that was valuable in many ways. The work was discontinued because an hon. Member in the House of Commons thought it right to object to this form of producing the revised statutes, and I myself said that if that was the mode in which the matter was to be discussed after it had gone through this process in this House—if, notwithstanding, it was to be discussed as if it were a new Bill—I would no longer be responsible for asking a number of distinguished men to act with me in the matter. From that time, when one of these Bills was rejected in the House of Commons for the reason I have stated, this work has been discontinued. I can only say that I very heartily welcome the renewal of that procedure, and I have no doubt the work will be well and accurately done. The consolidation and correction of the forms of the statute law has been brought down to 1886, and so far as I know not a single mistake has been made. I heartily support the Bill.

On Question, Bill read 2ª, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

RULE COMMITTEE BILL [H.L].

[Second Reading].

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, this Bill received a Second Reading last year and passed through your Lordships' House. Its object is a very modest one. It is to provide that there should be two solicitors on the Rule Committee instead of one. I might have hoped that so unambitious a project would have succeeded in obtaining legislative sanction, but it was found impracticable in the other House to pass it last session. I cannot help feeling that there is inconvenience to public Departments through perfectly uncontroversial Bills not being able to secure a passage through Parliament without great difficulty. This is a mere departmental administrative difficulty, and, being of a sanguine temperament, I hope that the Bill may now succeed in obtaining the consent of both Houses of Parliament.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2ª."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Lord ALVERSTONE: My Lords, I desire to support the Second Reading of this Bill. Although, as my noble friend has said, this is a small measure, it is one to which considerable importance is attached by the solicitor branch of the profession. Having worked on the Rule Committee for many years I think it will be a very great advantage if we have a larger number of men on that Committee who are acquainted with the practical working of the administration of justice from the solicitor's point of view. I sincerely trust the Bill will pass. I think there is a slip in Clause 1 which will require attention. It is provided that the persons in whom the power of making Rules of Court under the Judicature Acts is vested shall include four persons, but only three are described. When the Bill is in Committee I think it will be necessary to put in some definition of the fourth person who is to be added to the Committee.

On Question, Bill read 2ª, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

JUDICATURE BILL [H.L.]

Order of the day for the Third Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, it will perhaps be expected that I should say one or two words to explain why this Bill, which I described as urgent, has not been brought forward for Third Reading before. The reason is that some controversy has apparently arisen; and I have received communications indicative of hostility, which I cannot say is unusual in the legal profession towards legal reform. My desire is that objections should be considered maturely and upon their merits, and there is nothing I should like less than to hurry through Parliament a Bill to which exception is taken. Therefore I postponed the Third Reading until now.

It is possible that this Bill will now embark upon a more stormy course than it has hitherto experienced. I can only say the object of the Bill is not to split the Court of Appeal into Courts consisting of two members each. It is a Bill merely to provide for so doing where the Lord Chancellor is satisfied that there is a special cause. It is not a Bill intended to affect the work of the Court of Appeal as a regular rule, but only temporarily to deal with an emergency which everybody admits—namely, the unfortunate block of business in the Court of Appeal, an accumulation that is still slowly increasing rather than diminishing. I am sure that anyone responsible for the management of the judicial business of the country would feel bound to take some step in order to meet this great difficulty. I do not propose to suggest any Amendments at this stage. But I desire to treat this Bill as an uncontroversial measure, and so long as its main effect is not impaired, the Government will be inclined to consider impartially any improvements that may be suggested.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3ª."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: My Lords, I am entirely in favour of this Bill, treating it as a measure designed to meet an emergency. My judicial experience has convinced me that if two people sit together and form the same judgment, the other side has not so good an opportunity of being heard as would otherwise be the case. I have been struck by the admirable manner in which the work of the Court of Appeal has been done; and I wish to bear my testimony to the extreme care with which even trivial cases have been sifted and adjudicated upon by that tribunal.

It is impossible, owing to the altered condition of things, to make a comparison between the Court of Appeal and the old Court of Exchequer Chamber. I think a certain absence of familiarity with the condition of things that then existed has led to an unfavourable comparison being made between the two Courts. It is not easy to bring to the attention of your Lordships, although some of you are lawyers, the technical difficulties that surrounded the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The Court of Exchequer Chamber only heard what are technically known among lawyers as errors, and I suppose not one case in twenty of those that are subject to appeal could be brought before the Court of Error.

Certain regulations were made in relation to the higher Courts. By an Act of William III. the Exchequer Chamber and others were regulated, and finally I think in 11 George IV. and 1 William IV., there was some improvement made, but one difficulty existed. Until 1852, when what is known as the Common Law Procedure Act was passed, there was the whole cumbrous proceedings of writ of error, joinder in error, assignments in error, every one of these steps expensive and delaying; and the Court of Exchequer Chamber itself had no certain time to sit and no certain constitution of its members, and one reason why the Court of Exchequer Chamber was not very slow in disposing of its business was that there was no business to do. The people who complained of judgments could not get there. But in 1852, under the Common Law Procedure Act, there was a little more approximation to judicial determination of every question in dispute brought before the Courts.

The principle of two Judges disposing of matters on appeal certainly has been tried under very favourable circumstances. Lord Justice James and Lord Justice Mellish, two of the most eminent lawyers who ever sat on the English Bench, gave entire satisfaction sitting as a Court of two. I do not, however, support this Bill on the ground that I think two Judges should constitute a Court permanently. I have thought it right to say these few words not only because I am a member of the Court of Appeal myself, but because I think undue complaint has been made of the Court of Appeal. The delay arises in a great measure from an increase in litigation, and people do not seem to remember that a great deal of the law has been altered. When I was first called to the Bar the people whow knew most about the question in dispute were excluded from the witness box, and the art of nisi prius at that time was a cunning game of chess. But wiser counsels have since prevailed. The result is that you have doubled and trebled the amount of litigation that was possible under the old system, and this has led to a block of business in the Court of Appeal. That Court has most diligently and ably fulfilled its functions, and is in no way deserving of the criticism which has been passed upon it.

*LORD ALVERSTONE: My Lords, I am sure it will be a great satisfaction for the legal profession to hear the statement which the Lord Chancellor has repeated this afternoon, that there is to be no permanent reduction in the number of Judges in the Court of Appeal. That particular matter has been the subject of representations made to me, and I know to other members of the Bench, from persons who are absolutely friendly to His Majesty's Government and have the strongest faith in everything which my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack may do; but the experience of the last few weeks has shown us that difficulties may arise from Courts of two, and I am sure that the announcement that the Lord Chancellor has made to-day will very much assist in another place the passing of this Bill, which I believe to be absolutely necessary. I am afraid that on the last occasion I availed myself of the opportunity of uttering a cry in the wilderness. But the numerous communications that I have received and the study which I have given to this project confirm me in the opinion that the subject must at no late date be looked at from a larger standpoint. It will really be necessary to consider whether the number of Judges is sufficent to deal with business as it is now conducted. Whether or not the number of cases can be reduced I am not sure, but I am quite sure that the matter cannot be dealt with permanently as in this Bill, and that some further reforms will be absolutely necessary.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I agree with the noble Earl in regard to what he said about the Court of Appeal. We would indeed be ungrateful if we did not recognise the immense self-sacrifice and labour which have been exhibited by that Court, but they really have been of late overweighted, and I am anxious to relieve them. That is the purpose of this Bill. With regard to what my noble and learned friend the Lord Chief Justice has said, his cry was not a cry in the wilderness; on the contrary, since he made his speech, it has been pondered over and thought over by myself. I agree with him that the larger aspects of this question must be considered, and I contemplate considering them without delay, with a view of seeing whether some further amendment of a permanent character may be needed. I do not know whether it is so or not, but I think it might very fairly be carefully considered, in order to see whether some further steps are needed.

On Question, Bill read 3^a and passed, and sent to the Commons.

Admiralty Contracts in Ireland.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can state approximately the value of the contracts placed by the Admiralty with contractors in Ireland in the last financial year.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The total value of contracts placed with Irish firms during the financial year 1906–7 is approximately £43,000. This does not include local orders for the supply of fresh meat, provisions, &c., placed by ships in Irish waters.

Stoppages for Lost Time in Dockyard.

Sir JOHN BENN (Devonport): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether a shipwright who, having been summoned by telegram, was allowed to leave his work 2⅓ hours before bell-ringing, on 22nd December last, was checked five hours pay; and, if so, whether he will take steps to prevent employees, under such circumstances, being checked for more time than they actually lose.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.)—This man was checked five hours pay, in accordance with the regulation that workpeople leaving the yard more than two hours before bell-ringing are to be checked half a day's pay. In view, however, of the adoption of an hourly rate, steps will be taken to revise this regulation, as to prevent men being checked for more than the time actually lost. I may add that this man made no complaint to the Dockyard officers, and that, had he done so, his case would have been favourably considered.

Building of the "Dreadnought"—Return of Ship Fitters' Assistants to their Shops.

Mr. BRAMSDON (Portsmouth): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that, at the beginning of the building of the "Dreadnought" in Portsmouth Dockyard, men were taken from the different shops and sent to work on that ship; that some were put on the ordinary labourer's work known as under the boatswain, whilst others were sent as riveters, drillers, caulkers, and chippers; and, seeing that, after the "Dreadnought" was finished, the men from the blacksmiths' shops and hosemakers' and plumbers' shops went back to their respective foremen, will he explain why the ship fitters' assistants under the chief constructor were not similarly treated, but are still distributed about the yard.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The facts are not exactly as stated, as the men still detached from shops include some taken from other than fitters' shops, the requirements of the service not having permitted of the return of all the men to their previous duties. Their case will be considered when the condition of the work permits.

Post Office—Limited Competition for Male Learners at Dublin.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Postmaster-General under what circumstances a limited competition for male learners has been announced to be held in Dublin in April; is he aware that the limits of age are such as to prohibit postmen and those serving for some time as auxiliary sorting clerks and telegraphists from competing; and will he say for whom the vacancies are intended.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) A limited competition for male learners at Dublin was held on the 17th instant to fill vacancies which at present exist in the class of learner. The competition is restricted to telegraph messengers and other unestablished persons with at least one year's continuous service in the Post Office. The officers to whom the hon. Member refers are not required to pass through the class of learner. As I explained to the hon. Member for West Wicklow on the 12th ultimo, they will, in due course, be permitted to take part in a limited competition for direct appointment to the class of sorting clerk and telegraphist.

Direct and Indirect Taxation in Great Britain and Ireland.

MR. O'MARA (Kilkenny, S.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state the relative percentages of direct and indirect taxation in Great Britain and Ireland in the past financial year, and what he estimates those percentages will be under his new proposals next year.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The relative percentages of direct and indirect taxation for the two years are estimated for Great Britain and Ireland respectively as follows —

1906–7.
Great Britain - -	52·7	47·3
Ireland - - -	27·3	72·7
1907–8.
Ireland - - -	27·0	73·0

Officers' Extra Pay for Brevet Rank on Sea-going Ships.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what is the total increase of pay and allowances, including any pay of extra staff, due to officers being given brevet rank in sea-going fleets.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The total increase of pay and allowances, including the wages of additional domestics, amounts to approximately £3,460 a year; but it must be distinctly understood that this does not represent any additional cost to the nation, but only the difference between the ordinary pay and allowances of the four officers in question and those attaching for the moment to their acting rank, which is determined by the importance of the station.

Separation of Executive and Judicial Functions at Sind.

MR. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the fact that in March, 1904, eleven resident magistrates were appointed in Sind to form a separate service, and that a protest was received from the Sind Hindu Sabha, on 27th November, 1906, against recent orders amalgamating these appointments with the Revenue Department; and whether, considering the desirability generally of separating judicial and executive functions, he will consider the expediency of reverting to the arrangements of 1904.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) I have no information as to the recent orders mentioned, but I will inquire.

Payment of Deputy County Court Judges in England and Ireland.

Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will grant a statement showing the total amount of daily remuneration for the five financial years ended 31st March, 1906, paid to deputy county court Judges in Ireland and England respectively; the average daily remuneration paid to each deputy county court Judge for the same period in Ireland and England respectively; and whether such daily remuneration has been paid in every case by each county court Judge for whom each deputy was acting.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) Deputy county court Judges are paid ordinarily by the county court Judges out of the salaries of the latter, and the Treasury has no knowledge of the amounts so paid throughout the year. I regret, therefore, that I am not able to give the information asked for in the first two parts of the Question. As regards the last part, in certain cases where there is a vacancy for the judgeship or where the Judge is absent from his circuit on duty elsewhere, the deputy is paid out of the Votes for county courts.

Appointments to the Colonial Audit Branch.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state under what authority and under what regulations the Colonial Audit Branch in London was formed under the Comptroller and Auditor General in 1889; under what authority was the power of making clerical appointments to this branch conferred on the Comptroller and Auditor General; whether the Comptroller and Auditor General had power conferred on him of nomination to appointments as auditors in certain Crown Colonies and Protectorates abroad; if so, under what authority; what authority fixed the salaries of these nomination appointments at home and abroad; and whether the cost of housing of the Colonial Audit Branch in London was paid for out of Imperial funds from 1889 to 1906, without any appropriations in aid being received from the various Crown Colonies and Protectorates in respect thereto.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The Colonial Audit Branch was formed by the Comptroller and Auditor General, at the request of the Secretary of State for the Colonies and with the sanction of the Treasury, to undertake the audit of the accounts of various Colonies. In accordance with regulations framed with the concurrence of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, all appointments to the Colonial Audit Branch, both at Home and in the Colonies, were vested in the Comptroller and Auditor General. The salaries of the staff in the Colonies were approved by the Secretary of State for the Colonies; the salaries of the staff at headquarters were fixed by the Comptroller and Auditor General on the scales generally in force for the main office. With regard to the last paragraph of the Question the hon. Member is referred to the Answer given him on 7th March, 1906.†

Treasury Grants to Upkeep of Government Department Luncheon Rooms.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will grant a statement showing the special Treasury allowance to each Government Department towards the cost of the upkeep of its luncheon room, where there is one; the total cost to the State, including housing accommodation, fire, light, etc., of each of such luncheon rooms; the names of the Government Departments in which the staff has the option of lunching outside the building; and the names of the Government Departments in which the staff is not allowed such option, with the reasons for this prohibition where it exists.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The information for which the hon Member asks would take much time and labour to prepare, and I venture to doubt whether any proportionate result would be achieved. The Answer to the first part of the Question, however, can be readily obtained from the published volume of the Civil Service Estimates.

The Colonial Audit Branch.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state the terms on which the Colonial Audit Branch was recently amalgamated with the Exchequer and Audit Department; whether the Comptroller and Auditor General is allowed the right to transfer auditors from the various Crown Colonies and Protectorates to the newly amalgamated Colonial Audit Branch and Exchequer and Audit Department; whether one of these auditors with a salary, with allowances of nearly £500 per annum and only seventeen years service, who was neither a civil servant nor a university graduate on his first appointment to the Colonial Audit Branch, and who did not pass a Civil Service examination on admission to the branch, was recently transferred from Gibraltar to the amalgamated Departments in London; if so, whether he is now in receipt of nearly £500 per annum with allowances out of imperial funds, ranks higher, and receives over twice the salary of his fellow clerks of the same length of service who secured their appointments after success in Civil Service open competitions; if so, whether such procedure is in accordance with the terms on which the Colonial Audit Branch has been amalgamated with the Exchequer and Audit Department; and for what reason was this official transferred from Gibraltar to London and another official sent from London to Gibraltar in his stead.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.) The essence of the new scheme is that the appointment of auditors and assistant auditors in the various Colonies concerned will be made from the staff of the Exchequer and Audit Department, and transfers will consequently take place between members of the staff at Home and in the Colonies. The transfer referred to was carried out in the interests of the public service and without detriment to individual prospects.

Guaranteed Irish Land Stock.

Mr. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state of £12,756,120 guaranteed land stock, $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., redeemable not before 5th August, 1921, how much has been exchanged for Consols, and at what price; how much has been purchased by Government, and at what price; how much has been extinguished, and at what price; how much is in hands of private investors; how much is lodged in court to the credit of estates sold under the Land Purchase Acts of 1891 and 1896, still unallocated; and what is the total outstanding amount of above stock now, and by whom is it held.

(Answered by Mr. Runciman.)—

of which there has been cancelled, as the equivalent of a similar amount of cash - - - - -		894,595
Leaving still outstanding		12,740,778
Of this balance the National Debt Commissioners have given Consols in exchange, stock for stock, to the nominal amount of -	£7,950,000 and have, on balance, purchased at an average price of $96\frac{1}{4}$ - -	1,068,030
		9,018,030

which is held by the public and other Government Departments. I have no information as to the stock held otherwise than by the National Debt Commissioners.

North China Campaign—Special Promotion for Naval Officers.

Sir JOHN BENN: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the captain and paymaster of H.M.S. "Algerine," and the captains of His Majesty's destroyers "Fame" and "Whiting" received special promotion for their services in the North China campaign of 1900, and if the engineer officers who were in charge of the machinery of those vessels have received any reward or recognition; and, if not, whether he will secure equal treatment in such matters in all branches of the Navy.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The captain and assistant paymaster of the "Algerine" and the commanding officer of the "Fame," were specially promoted for services in North China, 1900. The commanding officer of the "Whiting" did not receive promotion. The engineer officers of the "Fame" and "Whiting" have not received reward or special recognition. All branches of the Navy receive equal treatment in this respect, according to the nature of their services, which are carefully considered by the Admiralty. It may be mentioned that several engineer officers received special promotion for war service in South Africa and China.

Pay of Chargemen in Portsmouth Dockyard.

MR. BRAMSDON: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether chargemen of labourers in the different departments of Portsmouth dockyard receive the maximum rate of pay as skilled labourers, namely, 28s. per week and 1s. per day charge-money, with the exception of the department under the chief constructor, where they receive 25s. per week and 1s. per day charge-money; if so, will he state the reason; and whether their Lordships can see their way clear to make all the departments identical in this respect by being paid the higher wage.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The hon. Member would appear to have been misinformed as to the facts of the case, as there are established chargemen in the constructive department receiving the maximum rate of pay.

Waterford and London Mails.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether letters for London and the South of England, posted in Waterford and district after the departure of the 3.40 p.m. train which runs in connection with the night mail service by Holyhead, are despatched by the train leaving Waterford by the Rosslare and Fishguard route at 10.35 p.m.; and, if so, will he say at what hour are letters despatched by the 10.35 p.m. train from Waterford by Rosslare delivered in London on the following day.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) There is a despatch of letters from Waterford to London by the Rosslare and Fishguard route by the 10.35 p.m. train; and the letters for the London town districts fall into the deliveries commencing about or soon after 11 a.m. on the following day.

Board of Trade Advisory Committee on the Merchant Shipping Act.

MR. JENKINS (Chatham): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state how many members have been appointed on the Advisory Committee of the Board of Trade under The Merchant Shipping Act, 1906; how many of the members are shipowners or persons interested in shipping; how many are shipbuilders, and whether they are also owners or share-owners in shipping property; whether he can state if Captain Trenery, who has been nominated by the Merchant Service Guild, is a shore superintendent of the Johnson Line of steamers; whether Mr. Shera, one of the members of the Committee, was formerly superintendent and engineer for several shipping companies; how many members of the Committee personally represent seamen; and whether he will take into consideration the appointment of additional representatives on the Committee who have no interest in shipping property.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The Advisory Committee to which my hon. friend refers consists of nineteen members. Of these five were nominated by the Shipowners Parliamentary Committee, and two are shipbuilders or naval architects. Captain Trenery was nominated by the Merchant Service Guild as a representative of masters and officers; Mr. Shearer and another gentleman represent the marine engineers; and two representatives of seamen and one of firemen were nominated by the Seamen and Firemen's Union. The remaining members of the Committee are two underwriters, a second representative of masters and officers, and three nominees of the Board of Trade, of whom one is my hon. friend, the Member for Limerick City, and the other two are shipowners. I know nothing with regard to the private interests, past or present, of the individuals nominated by the various bodies to represent them on the Committee, the composition of which was decided at a meeting at the Board of Trade at which representatives of seamen were present. I regard the Committee as fairly representative of the interests concerned; and I am not prepared at present to add to the number of its members.

Income-Tax Returns.

Sir F. DIXON - HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his scheme making it compulsory on every man to make a declaration and send back a return, on the well-known buff form, of his total income, though it may be taxed at the source, is to be the total amount of such income, or whether the whole of the items are to be given of the hundred and one sources, however small, from which it may be composed.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The hon. Member is under a misapprehension. Returns of total income, whether taxed at the source or not, will, as hitherto, only be required from persons claiming relief. I only propose to compel the taxpayer to return on the "buff" form what he is asked to return upon it now, viz., income upon which he is assessable, and if he has no such income to make a "nil" return.

Labourers' Cottages at Cootehill.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Cootehill No. 1 Rural District Council have rejected a number of agricultural labourers' representations for cottages on the ground that the labourers applying reside in the urban district of Cootehill; and, in view of the fact that these men are compelled to live in the town owing to want of accommodation outside, and that they are employed by farmers in the rural district, will the Local Government Board's attention be directed to their claims.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) It appears from the rural district council's minutes that of 108 representations lodged ninety-six were approved by them. Twelve representations in the Cootehill electoral division were apparently rejected on the ground that the applicants are residing and working in the urban district of Cootehill, and that the urban district council should proceed in such cases under the Housing of the Working Classes Act. Any applicant aggrieved can appear before the Local Government Board's inspector at the local inquiry into the scheme of the rural district council, which will be held in due course.

Reinstatement of Irish Evicted Tenants—Case of Thomas Brady.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement of Thomas Brady, who was evicted from the estate of E. P. Smith, Bellamont Forest, Cootehill; were agreements for the purchase of this estate signed as far back as November, 1905; was it agreed at the time of sale that the evicted tenants were to be restored; and will the Estates Commissioners explain the cause of delay in the above case.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement from Thomas Brady, who appears to be the son of Thomas Brady who was evicted in this case. As the latter is still alive the son is not eligible for reinstatement under the Act. The Commissioners are not aware that it was a condition of the agreement for sale of the estate that the evicted tenants should be reinstated but inquiries on the subject will be made before the advances are sanctioned. The purchase agreements in the case were lodged in September, 1905, and the estate has not yet reached its turn to be dealt with.

Return of Local Contributions.

Mr. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will grant the Return of Local Contributions of which notice stands upon the Order Paper.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I will offer no objection to the granting of this Return, but it will take some time to prepare, as the particulars will have to be obtained from local authorities.

Condition of Irish Cattle.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, some time since, unfounded allegations were made respecting the prevalence of tuberculosis amongst Irish cattle, mainly cows: whether he is aware that those allegations have been disproved; whether, in conjunction with and the co-operation of the Board of Agriculture of Great Britain and the Department of Agriculture in Ireland, he will inquire into and prevent the practice of certain dealers purchasing English cattle and selling them as Irish on account of the superior healthy character of Irish cattle; and whether he will consult with the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture in Ireland and the President of the Board of Agriculture of Great Britain, and have an arrangement made that the Irish national trade mark shall be branded on all cattle exported from Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) The Department of Agriculture are aware that currency was given some time ago to a statement that tuberculosis is prevalent among Irish cattle. This statement appears to have expressed the personal opinion of its author. Tuberculosis is not scheduled under the Diseases of Animals Acts, and no comprehensive statistics are therefore available. The Department, however, are not aware of any reliable evidence which would go to support the statement referred to. The general reputation of Irish cattle as to healthiness is undoubtedly high. Inquiries are being made as to the alleged practice mentioned in the second part of the Question, and when the result of these inquiries is known, the Department will be in a position to consider what action can be taken in the matter.

War Office Contracts in Ireland.

Mr. J. MACVEAGH: To ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office, whether he can state approximately the total value of contracts made directly by the War Office with contractors; the names and amounts of any such contract placed with contractors in Ireland; the average strength in officers and men stationed in Ireland; and the average cost of victualling per head per year.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) The total value of the contracts, concerning which the hon. Member desires information, made direct with Irish firms (eighteen in number) amounted to about £64,000 last year; the total for all similar contracts was £1,200,000. The specific information required as to names and amounts cannot be published. The average strength of officers and men stationed in Ireland, including Militia recruits, is about 28,000. The cost of victualling per head of these troops (excluding officers) is about £8.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Naval Cadets.

Mr. WALKER (Leicestershire, Melton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, with reference to the statement of the First Lord that the cost of the thorough education given to naval cadets at the two Naval Colleges obliges the Admiralty to call upon the parents for a substantial contribution towards it, upon what principle a reduction in the charges is made in the case only of officers of the Navy and Army who can show that the fees paid are a serious burden; whether the present system restricts the area of selection; how large an additional sum would be involved if the whole cost of this education were placed upon the Navy Estimates; whether he is aware that in the United States Navy a system of nomination of cadetship is adjusted to democratic conditions by the State's undertaking the whole cost of the cadet's education and training until he attains a rank in the service at which his pay enables him to support himself.

The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. Robertson, Dundee): The reduction of fees in favour of a limited number of sons of naval and military officers in poor circumstances has long been an established custom in the entry of cadets for the Navy. As regards the area of selection, the number of candidates is roughly three times the number of vacancies. The additional cost in the present year if the whole charge were placed upon the Navy Estimates would be £55,000. As regards the last part of the Question, I believe it is a fact that in the United States the whole cost of the cadet's training is borne by the States from the time of his entry at an average age of eighteen.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): Have the Admiralty received any offers from local bodies or other authorities in response to the appeal made by the First Lord?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Not so far as I am aware.

Brevet Rank Pay and Allowances.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, what is the total increase of pay and allowances, including any pay of extra staff, due to officers being given brevet rank in sea-going fleets.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The total increase of pay and allowances including the wages of additional domestics, amounts to approximately £3,460 a year; but it must be distinctly understood that this does not represent any additional cost to the nation, but only the difference between the ordinary pay and allowances of the four officers in question and those attaching for the moment to their acting rank which is determined by the importance of the station.

Command of the Maltese Garrison.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, whether, in the future, the Governor of Malta will continue to command the troops stationed in that island, in view of the fact that it has been decided to appoint a General Officer to command all the troops stationed in the Mediterranean.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): The functions of the Governor and his title will be unchanged. He will command the troops in Malta as at present. He will, of course, be subject in this command to the authority of the Commander-in-Chief of the Troops in the Mediterranean.

Eastern Command Auxiliary Forces.

MR. A. L. LEVER (Essex, Harwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, whether, having regard to the falling off in the number of Auxiliary Forces, Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers, which go to Colchester for their annual training, and in view of the special facilities offered for musketry by the existing ranges, and for manœuvring and field exercises by the additional Government ground acquired in the immediate neighbourhood of Middlewick and vicinity, he will augment the numbers this year so that the Auxiliary Forces may participate in the advantages to be derived from a standing camp.

MR. HALDANE: The arrangements for the training of the Auxiliary Forces in the Eastern Command have already been made for this year by the General Officer Commanding in Chief, and I am afraid that no changes can now be made.

Survey of India.

DR. HAZEL (West Bromwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, what are the duties and salary attached to the office of mathematical expert to the Survey of India; when was the office created; by whom is the appointment authorised to be made; and what is the process of selection adopted on the occurrence of a vacancy.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. MORLEY, Montrose Burghs): The expert is required for the difficult mathematical operations which the work of the Survey involves. One such post has existed since 1885. A second has now been created as the work has increased. Mr. Hunter's salary commences at the equivalent of £600 a year and will rise in the course of eighteen years to £1,280. The appointment rests with the Secretary of State in Council, and was made after full inquiries as to possible candidates both of British or Indian nationality possessing the requisite qualifications.

DR. HAZEL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, what are the age and University distinctions of Mr. J. H. Hunter, who has been recently appointed to the office of mathematical expert to the Survey of India; and whether any attempt was made to secure the services of one of the distinguished mathematicians of Indian nationality who have taken the highest honours at the University of Cambridge and elsewhere.

MR. MORLEY: Mr. Hunter was bracketed twelfth wrangler in the Cambridge Mathematical Tripos, 1903, and obtained a first class in the Mechanical Science Tripos, 1904. His age is twenty-six. I have already said that the qualifications of such mathematicians of Indian nationality as were available were duly considered. I may perhaps say that the office was offered to, and declined by, an Indian who had taken a high degree at Cambridge.

Lahore Demonstrations.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY (St. Andrews Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, whether his attention has been called to the recent demonstration at Lahore in regard to the imprisonment of the proprietor and editor of an Indian paper for publishing a seditious statement, when the police, who were conveying the prisoners from the court to the gaol, were stopped by a large crowd of natives who pelted them with mud, and crowned the prisoners with garlands; also to the fact that the crowd afterwards paraded the street and assaulted every isolated European they met, until dispersed by the police; and, as this is a repetition of what happened at the second trial in February last, he now proposes to take steps to prevent the recurrence of such demonstrations.

MR. MORLEY: The local authorities have power to deal with these disturbances and will no doubt take all possible precautions against their recurrence. The duties of Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab have just been taken up by Sir Denzil Ibbetson, one of the most experienced and trusted officers in the Indian Service.

New Hebrides—Trade in Intoxicating Liquors.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether his attention has been called to the recent complaints regarding the sale of intoxicating liquors to the natives of the New Hebrides, and to the statement that some French steamers recently left Sydney, New South Wales, carrying large stores of liquor for those islands; and whether he will take adequate steps to safeguard the welfare of these people.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The attention of His Majesty's Government has been called to complaints that a large quantity of spirits from French sources is still imported into the New Hebrides; and they are in communication with the French Government on the subject. They have, however, no information to the effect that intoxicating liquors are imported in any quantity from Sydney, either in British or French vessels; and by a proclamation of the 28th November last their exportation from the Commonwealth to the New Hebrides is prohibited, unless a permit has been first obtained from the Comptroller-General of Customs.

MAJOR ANSTRUTHER-GRAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire if any liquors have not recently been imported into the New Hebrides from Sydney?

MR. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir.

Port of Spain Borough Council.

MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that some time ago a petition, signed by practically the whole of the ratepayers of the Port of Spain, was presented, asking for the restoration of its elected borough council (which it enjoyed for a period of fifty years); that the prayer of the petitioners has not been acceded to, but that instead a wholly nominated town board has been set up for a period of three years, with a commissioner at a salary of £800 a year; whether, in view of Lord Elgin's statement in a despatch of 21st June last, that his decision was therefore that there shall be for two years a board, he will state why it has been made three years instead of two; and whether, at the end of the three years, the elective principle will be restored.

MR. CHURCHILL: The petition was duly received and carefully considered. The Secretary of State's decision was intimated in the despatch to which the hon. Member's Question refers, and with the purport of which he is no doubt acquainted. The Governor reported that an Ordinance to give effect to the Secretary of State's decision would be introduced at the session of the Legislative Council, which opened on the 4th of February. It is not known whether the Ordinance has yet been passed by the Council, and no intimation has been received from the Governor as to whether or not it is proposed to appoint the new board for three years instead of for two years, as originally contemplated. With regard to the last paragraph of the hon. Member's Question, the decision in the Secretary of State's despatch of the 21st of June, 1906, was that at the end of two years "the question whether the existing board shall be continued or shall be replaced either at once or gradually by an elected board shall be again submitted to the Legislative Council," and it is impossible at present to add anything to that decision.

Public Works at Tangier.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that a contract for public works at Tangier has been given by the Moorish Government to a German firm; whether the circumstances under which it was given are a violation of the Act of Algeciras; and, if so, what steps His Majesty's Government, as one of the signatories of that Convention, propose to take in the matter.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): A question of this kind has been raised respecting a particular contract at Tangier. It is one which, no doubt, will be settled on the spot in accordance with the provisions of the Algeciras Act, which every Government desires to uphold.

MR. ASHLEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman instruct His Majesty's representative at Tangier to deal with the matter under Section 108 of the Act?

Youthful Offenders Bill.

MR. WEDGWOOD (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the importance of preventing children and young persons from being sent to prison in default of payment of fines, the Government will consider giving facilities to the Youthful Offenders Bill.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): The effect of the Probation of Offenders Bill which is now before this House will be to substitute in many cases a new mode of dealing with offenders for fine and imprisonment. I hope that the provisions of the Bill, if it passes into law, will be specially taken advantage of in juvenile offender cases. Much as I sympathise with the object my hon. friend has in view, I am afraid special facilities cannot be given to this Bill.

Qualifications and Appointment of Quarry Managers.

SIR ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorganshire, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for the Eifion division of Carnarvonshire, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any supervision is exercised by the Home Office with regard to the qualifications and appointment of quarry managers; and, if not, whether, in view of the fact that the percentage of fatalities among inside workers in slate quarries in 1905 was nearly double that in coal mines, and that there have been six lives lost in Carnarvonshire already this year, he will appoint a Committee of Inquiry, with a view to the Amendment of the Quarries Act.

MR. GLADSTONE: There are no statutory requirements at present as to the appointment or qualifications of quarry managers. This is a point which has already been noted for consideration when I can find an opportunity for amending the Quarry Act. Having regard to the complication of the existing legislation on the subject, I have decided to consult the Chairman of the Royal Commission on Mines, with a view to advising His Majesty to include the consideration of accidents in quarries in the reference to the Commission.

Poor Prisoners' Defence.

Mr. JOHN O'CONNOR (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications have been made under the Poor Prisoners' Defence Act at the Central Criminal Court and at the county of London sessions; how many have been refused; and, if any, what are the grounds of such refusals.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I am informed that at the Central Criminal Court there have been 394 applications made under the Poor Prisoners Defence Act since it came into force, of which 290 have been refused. At the London sessions it has not been possible to get out complete figures, but during 1906 there were 111 such applications, of which 107 were refused. These figures are exclusive of the applications made under the Act to the committing magistrates. The Act itself specifies the conditions on which payment can be made from public funds for the defence of prisoners in criminal cases—he must disclose his defence, and his own means must be insufficient, and applications under the Act are necessarily refused when these conditions are not fulfilled.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would consider the desirability of amending the Act in view of the large proportion of refusals.

Mr. GLADSTONE said he would confer with the Attorney-General, who had more to do with this matter than he had.

West Jesmond Off-licence Case.

Mr. HUDSON (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the decision of the magistrates at the recent annual sessions at West Jesmond, Newcastle on-Tyne, whereby they refused to grant an off-licence to a house in the locality, and to the fact that the interested person has since secured an excise licence for the same premises; and can he say whether he intends to introduce new legislation, or what steps, if any, he proposes to take to deal with such cases.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I have had my attention drawn to this case, and have made inquiry about it. The facts are substantially as stated in the Question. The sale by retail of intoxicating liquors without a justices' licence, of which this appears to be an instance, is a matter which has already occupied my careful consideration in connection with the proposed Licensing Bill.

Medical Examinations of Workpeople.

Mr. WEDGWOOD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a paper read before the English Ceramic Society by Dr. Shufflebotham, an acknowledged authority in lead poisoning, in which he urges that certifying surgeons should be provided with a private room in each factory for the periodical examination of workpeople, to avoid the present superficial examination in semi-public offices; and whether the Home Office will inquire into the conditions under which these examinations are carried on with a view to possible improvements.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I have not myself seen the paper referred to, but in the covering letter issued with the Earthenware Special Rules of 1901, manufacturers were informed that arrangements should be made to allow due privacy for the medical examination required under the rules. The health register in use at each pottery contains the following instruction:—"In order to secure due privacy it is requested that the surgeon may have the exclusive use of a room or office while he is conducting the examination." The Medical Inspector of Factories has made special inquiry into this subject, and I learn that one of the four certifying surgeons in the Staffordshire potteries had no complaint to make of unsuitable rooms being provided for his examination of workers or of want of privacy; and in the very few cases mentioned by the other surgeons, in which the intervention of the medical inspector was necessary, there was no difficulty in securing better conditions. As regards the alleged superficial nature of the present examination, I may point out that all that can be done on factory premises in the way of physical examination is to observe the objective signs of absorption of lead into the system, which are very few, namely, blue line on gums, anæmia, and weakness of fingers or wrist. In cases where the certifying surgeon considers a further examination necessary he arranges for the workman to attend at his surgery.

Clare Lunatic Asylum Sewerage Scheme.

MR. HALPIN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade will he inquire into the cause of delay in not returning plans of sewerage from the Clare Lunatic Asylum to the inspectors of lunatics, in order that the sanction of the Lord-Lieutenant be obtained to carry out the works, those plans having been forwarded to the Board of Trade eight months ago, and notices published in the Dublin and local papers over four months ago, asking for any objections to the sewage works being carried out, and stating that within twenty-one days the Board would proceed in the matter; whether he is aware that a serious epidemic of typhoid fever broke out at the asylum owing to the alleged defective sewerage, by which several of the patients lost their lives, and the sanction of the Board of Trade became necessary owing to the fact that the sewers are to be carried over a small stream subject to tidal influence that runs dry in the summer season; and that the principal owner and occupier of the adjacent lands gave his sanction to the project months ago.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): The first communication in this matter from the Dublin Office of Lunatic Asylums was received in August last, but it was not until October that the necessary plans were forwarded to the Board who, in the same month, gave instructions for the application to be advertised. The Lunatic Asylums Office, however, demurred to the newspapers prescribed by the Board for the advertisement, with the result that proofs of the advertisement were received only on 5th January last. On receipt of these proofs the owners of property adjacent to the site of the proposed works were at once consulted by the Board of Trade, but one of them—though written to more than once—neglected to reply, thus causing delay. The Board of Trade have now informed the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums that they are prepared to consent to the works on certain conditions. I have no information as to the matter referred to in the last part of the Question.

Cost of Post Office Services in Scotland.

MR. MORTON (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he will state the amount of revenue for Post Office services in Scotland for the five years ending 31st March, 1907, and the cost of the said services for the same period.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The information for the year which ended on the 31st ultimo is not yet available. For the four previous years, it is as follows:—

Year	Revenue. £	Expenditure. £
1902–3	1,798,000	1,427,000
1903–4	1,866,000	1,445,000

Wage Receipts.

MR. WILKIE (Dundee): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the fact that a receipt for wages, even if over the amount of £2, does not require a stamp to be affixed, he will issue instructions that the custom of causing post office servants to so affix stamps to their wages receipts be discontinued in the future.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: There is no foundation for the premiss that a receipt for wages of £2 or upwards is exempt from stamp duty.

Royston Head Teachership.

MR. CLOUGH (Yorkshire, W. R., Skipton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware that the two members of the West Riding education authority who reported upon the head teachership of the Royston School, have for some years been members of the staffing committee, one of them being the chairman, and are consequently specially experienced in making the staffing appointments throughout the Riding, and that their clerk had previously been a school inspector, and was consequently specially experienced in dealing with children and testing the efficiency of teachers; will he say whether the Board of Education has ever issued any regulations that the duration of visits to schools shall exceed forty-five minutes; that more than fifteen minutes shall be spent with the children in the school; and that more than six questions in geography and mental arithmetic shall always be asked of the children.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): I understand that the facts stated in the first portion of my hon. friend's Question are correct, but I have no information as to the accuracy of the conclusions which he draws from them. The Board have no jurisdiction to determine what evidence a local education authority may require upon which to base a decision as to the educational unfitness of a teacher, and they have not, therefore, issued any regulations on the subject.

Elementary School Rifle Corps.

MR. SUMMERBELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether the Board of Education is in favour of having rifle corps attached to public elementary schools; whether instructions have been issued to inspectors to suggest to head masters of public elementary schools that their influence should be used during school hours to induce boys to join such rifle corps; whether the Board of Education is aware that at Galley's Field Upper Standard School, Hartlepool, targets are exhibited in the school, and boys have been taken out of school before the time for closing shown on the official time table for the purpose of receiving instruction in sighting, and for practising shooting on the rifle range; and that boys have been reprimanded in school for being absent from such instruction.

MR. MCKENNA: No instructions have been issued to inspectors of the kind suggested in the hon. Gentleman's Question, and I should not favour the issue of such instructions. The Board have no information as to the incidents referred to in the latter part of the Question, but I will cause inquiries to be made.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): Is it not the fact that at Lewisham forty out of forty-five elementary schools joined the Schools' Rifle Association?

*MR. SPEAKER: This Question relates to Hartlepool, which is a long way from Lewisham.

Board of Agriculture Offices.

MR. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W. R., Barkston Ash): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is now able to state whether the Government propose to take any steps to improve the existing accommodation of the Board of Agriculture.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury, for Mr. HARCOURT): The First Commissioner is considering the matter; but regrets that he is unable to make any statement on the subject at present.

New Government Buildings at Whitehall.

MR. LANE-FOX: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works what Government Departments are to be accommodated in the new buildings in Whitehall; and what is to be the eventual use to which the old War Office in Pall Mall is to be put.

MR. RUNCIMAN: The Board of Education and the Local Government Board will be accommodated in the new public offices as soon as they are ready for occupation. The most westerly portion of the old War Office, Nos. 80, 81, and 82, Pall Mall, is occupied by the Barrack Construction Department. The two houses adjoining, Nos. 83 and 84, will be occupied by the Office of Woods pending the rebuilding of their offices in Whitehall Place. All other houses have been surrendered to the Office of Woods, and the eventual use of these premises is a matter for that Department.

Licensing Compensation Appeals.

COLONEL HERBERT (Monmouthshire, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been drawn to the delay of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue in dealing with appeals under the Licensing Act, 1904, in respect of compensation in cases where the renewal of licences has been refused by the county licensing authority; whether he is aware that, in consequence of such delay, eighteen licensed houses in Monmouthshire, which twelve months ago were declared unnecessary or unsuitable, still remain open for the sale of intoxicants; whether the machinery for dealing with the large number of similar appeals from all parts of the country exists in the office of the Commissioners; and whether he will take steps to render operative the Licensing Act, 1904.

MR. RUNCIMAN: In six of the eighteen cases in question the full details required by the Board of Inland Revenue have not yet been obtained from the claimants, and it is not desirable to deal with cases from any district otherwise than together.

City of London Charities.

SIR D. BRYNMOR JONES (Swansea District): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Crewe Division, as representing the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, during the year ended 31st October, 1906, distributed out of moneys received by them from the Trustees of the City Parochial Charities to the churches of St. Mary, Aldermary, and St. Peter, Cornhill, the sums of £250 and £100 respectively, for repairs to their organs, in addition to the annual sums which they are authorised to pay for the maintenance of the fabric of the said churches, and for the ordinary cleaning and repairs of the said churches and the ornaments thereof by the Central Scheme of 23rd February, 1891; if so, by what authority, having regard to the terms of the City Parochial Charities Act, 1883, and the said Scheme, are these payments justified; and whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, during the year ended 31st October, 1906, made an additional annual grant of £60 to the church of St. Alban, Wood Street, out of moneys received by them from the Trustees of the City Parochial Charities, notwithstanding the provisions of Clause 49 of the Central Scheme of 23rd February, 1891, forbidding such increases.

MR. TOMKINSON (Cheshire, Crewe): The grants voted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in 1906 out of the residuary income of the City Church Fund paid over to them by the Central Governing Body of the City Parochial Foundation are set out in the Appendix No. 32 to the Annual Report of the Commissioners recently presented to Parliament, and they include the three grants mentioned in the Question. The annual sums authorised by the Central Scheme of 23rd February, 1891, to be paid for repairs of the fabrics of (amongst others) the churches of St. Mary, Aldermary, St. Peter, Cornhill, and St. Alban, Wood Street, and for the maintenance of the services of those churches, are payable by the Central Governing Body before any residue of income becomes payable to the Commissioners. There is nothing in the City Parochial Charities Act, 1883, or in the Central Scheme of 1891 to preclude the Commissioners from making to churches entitled to payments from the Central Governing Body other grants out of the residuary income paid over to the Commissioners. The grants in the cases of St. Mary, Aldermary, and St. Peter, Cornhill, were voted by the Commissioners in the exercise of their discretion in the application of the residuary income within the limits prescribed by the Act of 1883. The expenditure upon the organs was of an altogether exceptional nature. In the case of St. Mary, Aldermary, the repairs have been completed at a cost of over £1,200; in the case of St. Peter, Cornhill, the projected expenditure is not less than £1,000. The grant of £60 towards the maintenance of the services in the church of St. Alban, Wood Street, was made by the Commissioners in pursuance of an Order in Council of 1894 relating to the Union of the Benefices of St. Alban, Wood Street, and St. Michael, Wood Street. By this Order the Commissioners were directed out of such moneys as should from time to time be received by them under the provisions of the City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883, to make such a grant as would raise to £220 per annum the funds available for the maintenance of divine service in St. Alban's Church, which was thenceforth to serve as the church of the united parish. The grant of £60 raises the provision of £160 per annum under the Central Scheme of 1891 to the sum of £220 so fixed. The church of St. Michael, Wood Street, was demolished, and the annual payments of £45 and £250 directed by the Scheme of 1891 to be made by the Central Governing Body out of the City Church Fund for the benefit of that church ceased and fell into the residuary income payable to the Commissioners.

Kilshanny Evicted Tenant.

MR. HALPIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mary Organ, of Carrowerah, Kilshanny, West Clare, aged eighty-four years, was served with an ejectment on 7th December, 1906, and secondly served on 15th January, 1907, and evicted on 8th March, 1907; and that the landlord, Lord Inchiquin, or his agent, Mr. Edward O'Brien, was offered two years rent as a settlement, and declined; if he will inquire of the Estates Commissioners why they did not reply to the tenant's application for reinstatement; and is he aware that a gamekeeper is grazing the evicted farm without the consent and against the wish of the tenant.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N): The Estates Commissioners have not received a formal application for reinstatement from Mrs. Organ, but have received a letter from her in which she states that she was evicted on 8th March last, and asks for the Commissioners' assistance in the matter. The Commissioners have hitherto limited their intervention to the cases of evicted tenants who were evicted before the Act of 1903 was passed, and they do not propose to inquire at present into cases of eviction since the passing of the Act. Such cases will only be inquired into in connection with the sales of the particular estates on which the evictions took place. The Commissioners have no knowledge of the facts of the particular case.

Athenry Outrages.

SIR BERKELEY SHEFFIELD (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received police reports upon the occurrences of 13th March in the neighbourhood of Athenry when shots were fired into the house of a man named Tierney and stones were thrown into the dwelling of Mrs. Raftery; whether the last named was injured by this assault; and whether these persons are now protected from a repetition of such attacks.

MR. BIRRELL: The reply to each part of the Question is in the affirmative. The police are paying special attention to the locality with a view to the protection of the persons referred to.

*MR. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that more crime is committed in the Brigg Parliamentary Division than in any four counties in Ireland.

Ballinageeragh Rioters.

SIR BERKELEY SHEFFIELD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenent of Ireland whether he has received police reports to the effect that, for a considerable time past, a number of men in the district of Ballinageeragh have been hiding from the police in order to escape arrest from warrants issued against them on a charge of riot at an eviction; whether repeated efforts have been made, under circumstances of hardship, to execute these warrants; and whether he is taking steps to ensure that the King's writ shall run in county Cork.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers, may I ask him whether he is aware that the persons referred to in the Question have voluntarily surrendered to the magistrates some days ago, and that the case is now sub judice?

MR. BIRRELL: That is practically what I was about to say. The offence referred to, which took place in September last, consisted in a riot on an evicted farm, but not at an eviction. Five of the offenders were dealt with at the last winter assizes. Others against whom warrants were issued succeeded in evading arrest, being assisted by the difficult and mountainous nature of the country. Two of these have recently been apprehended, and twelve have surrendered to the police; and the case against all these persons is now sub judice. The two remaining accused persons are believed to have left the country.

Munster Rents.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the average reduction given on the fixing of second-term judicial rents by the Land Commission, first, in Munster, and, secondly, in all Ireland during the past twelve months; has it been the invariable practice of the Land Commission valuers to appreciate the land as they found it without making any allowance for the outlay of the tenants and the improvements effected by them; and whether, seeing that the terms suggested in the Land Conference Report were based upon second-term rents reduced by 22 per cent., do the reductions at present obtained by tenants bear any approximate relation to this figure.

Mr. BIRRELL: I am informed by the Land Commission that during the twelve months ending 31st March last the average reduction given on the fixing of second-term rents was, in Munster 19 per cent, and in all Ireland 18·6 per cent. In fixing fair rents the Land Commission pay due regard to the provisions of the Land Law Acts as judicially interpreted by the Supreme and other Courts in numerous decisions. Section 1 of the Land Law Act, 1896, requires the Court, when fixing a fair rent, to record in a schedule, unless both landlord and tenant shall otherwise request, certain particulars, including the improvements made wholly or partly by the tenant or at his cost, and the deduction from the rent made on account of such improvements. This statutory direction is, the Commissioners inform me, invariably obeyed.

Queen's County Evicted Tenants.

Mr. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say what is delaying the reinstatement of John Tynan to his holding at Derry Keeran, Raheen, Mountrath, on the estate of Sir Kildare Burrows; and whether, in view of the fact that Michael Dillon, an evicted tenant upon the Sheane estate, also in Raheen parish, has been reinstated, although the sale upon the Sheane estate was subsequent to that of the estate of Sir Kildare Burrows, he can explain the delay in dealing with John Tynan's application.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estates Commissioners are in negotiation with the owner for the purchase of the holding in this case, with the object of reinstating the evicted tenant. The Commissioners have not yet been able to come to an agreement with the owner as to price, but are making further inquiries in the matter. There has been no undue delay in the case.

Albemarle Estate Evicted Tenant.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMYTH (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if the Estates Commissioners have received an application for reinstatement from Thomas Scollen, Corlishen, Drumsna, for the farm of land in Corlishen, on the Albemarle estate, in county Leitrim, from which his father was evicted about twenty years ago; and, if so, will an inspector be sent to investigate the case.

Mr. BIRRELL: The Estate Commissioners have received the application in question and have had the case investigated. The present occupant of the evicted farm is unwilling to surrender it, and as the Commissioners understand that the evicted tenant received compensation when leaving the holding they have decided to take no action in the matter.

Dublin Civil Servants.

Mr. DELANY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what functions are exercised by Sir R. W. A. Holmes, K.C.B., Treasury Remembrancer at Dublin, with reference to applications for promotion forwarded to the Lords Commissioners of His Majesty's Treasury by the heads of Irish Government departments; whether he is aware that a feeling exists among Dublin Civil Servants that their advancement is in no wise proportionate to the increases granted to Sir Robert's personal staff; whether he will state, with reference to Messrs. J. T. Drennan, H. P. Boland, and E. Fahey, who were successively personal clerks to Sir Robert, what would be the present amount of their salaries if those of them who were entitled to annual increments received them, but no other promotion, from the date of their first appointment to the Treasury Remembrancer's office; what is the amount of the present salary and allowances of each of these gentlemen; whether there are any other instances in the Dublin Civil Service of either temporary or permanent clerks receiving such rapid advancement as has been given to these clerks; and whether he can arrange that other Dublin Civil Servants can be afforded equal opportunities to Sir Robert's staff when opportunities for promotion arise.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: I have made inquiries respecting the substance of this Question, and I am satisfied that there is no foundation for the insinuations which it contains against an officer of high distinction who has earned the confidence of successive Boards of Treasury. The hon. Member has put to me several Questions containing reflections on the personal character of public officials, for which I have found no evidence, and I must take this opportunity of adding that I shall in future decline to answer further inquiries of this kind.

Mr. DELANY: May I be allowed to ask the Prime Minister whether he will provide a gramaphone for the Treasury Bench in order to answer such Questions?

At the end of Questions:

Mr. DELANY asked Mr. Speaker whether it was in order for any Minister to refuse to answer Questions placed on the Paper regarding his Department or to announce in anticipation that he declined to answer in future Questions put to him.

*Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the Secretary to the Treasury refused to answer any Questions the hon. Member might put to him, but only certain Questions of a particular character. He said that if Questions of that character were put he would not undertake to answer them. I cannot compel any Minister to answer; he must use his judgment in each case as to whether an answer is desirable or not.

Mr. DELANY: To whom shall I in future address Questions in order that I may get an Answer? Is it to be to the clerks at the Table?

*Mr. SPEAKER: The only duty of the clerks at the Table is to see that the Question is framed according to Parliamentary traditions and order. It remains with the Minister to decide upon public grounds whether it should be answered or not.

Mr. DELANY: Am I to consult the Secretary to the Treasury as to whether a Question I wish to ask him is of the character he approves?

Dublin Post Office Employees Grievances.

Mr. DELANY: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if his attention has been drawn to complaints with reference to the treatment meted out to his employees in the Dublin office; is he aware that the annual increments of several officers have recently been stopped for such offences as a hasty word over the wire to a clerk of equal rank; was it with his sanction that an officer has been fined £5 4s. who had not a single late attendance in the course of a year, and who only had five minor irregularities in the year's work; is he aware that such an officer would have been granted his increment quite readily a few years ago; and whether, in the interests of contentment and goodwill amongst all classes in the postal service, he will take steps to secure a cessation of such treatment.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: I have no reason to think that the post office staff at Dublin is treated differently from the staff at other offices, or that the present treatment is different from that accorded in the past. The annual increments of certain officers at Dublin were recently withheld because they had committed serious irregularities, precluding the grant of the necessary certificate of a year's approved service. The particular officer who appears to be referred to is one of these. He was not fined, but in view of his record his increment of 2s. a week could not be allowed in ordinary course. He appealed to me, and I personally considered his appeal, and confirmed the decision.

Small Landholders (Scotland) Bill.

Mr. MORTON: I beg to ask the Prime Minister when he proposes to take the Second Reading of the Small Landholders (Scotland) Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER and FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Stirling Burghs): I hope very shortly.

Colonies and the Tariffs.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether there is any foreign country that gives as favourable treatment to British self-governing Colonies in the matter of tariffs as is given by the United Kingdom; and, if so, what is that country.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I presume that my hon. friend in asking this question is adopting the not unusual course of expressing by a question what is really his own opinion. I am not aware of any country which, on the whole, gives as favourable treatment to our self-governing Colonies as this country.

Defence of the Colonies.

MR. HAROLD COX: I beg to ask the Prime Minister whether the obligation of this country to defend the self-governing Colonies has ever been in any way defined by agreement or otherwise; and what is the reciprocal obligation which the Colonies have undertaken for the defence of the United Kingdom.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The obligation upon this country to defend the whole Empire is independent of any written agreement or treaty. No obligation on the part of the Colonies to participate in the defence of the United Kingdom has been made the subject of definition or of formal agreement. Judging from past experience, however, there seems to be no doubt that the Colonies recognise the obligations to assist in the defence of the Empire as a whole.

Assistant Clerks.

MR. ALDEN (Middlesex, Tottenham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will state when the Parliamentary Committee to inquire into the case of Assistant Clerks (new class), for which a petition signed by a majority of the Members of this House was presented to him on the 25th ultimo, will be appointed.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The pay and conditions of service of the Assistant Clerks have repeatedly received careful consideration in the last few years, and I do not think that any useful purpose would be served by referring the subject to a Parliamentary Committee.

EDUCATION (PROVISION OF MEALS) (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Reported from the Standing Committee on Law, etc., with an Amendment.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 125.]

Minutes of the Proceedings of the Standing Committee to be printed. [No. 125.]

Bill as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be taken into consideration upon Monday, 1st July.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

George Smith Clark, esquire, for the Borough of Belfast (North Belfast Division.)

Sir Brampton Gurdon further reported from the Committee that they had nominated Committee A as the Committee on which Government Bills shall not have precedence.

Sir Brampton Gurdon further reported from the Committee that they had selected the following eight Members to be the Chairmen's Panel, and to serve as Chairmen of the Four Standing Committees to be appointed under Standing Order No. 47:—Sir Thomas Esmonde, Mr. Laurence Hardy, Sir William Holland, Sir David Brynmor Jones, Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Mr. Eugene Wason, Mr. John Wilson (Durham), and Mr. John William Wilson.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—Army (Annual) Bill, without Amendment.

NOTIFICATION OF BIRTHS.

Lord R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to provide for the early notification of births, said that he had taken the unusual course of asking leave under the ten minutes rule, because of the very great gravity of the evil with which the Bill, however imperfectly and however modestly, attempted to deal. At the present moment 120,000 infants under one year of age died in this country every year, and it was no exaggeration to say that of these 60,000 might be saved if proper measures were taken. Such a state of things required the very earnest consideration of the House, for it amounted to this, that out of every 1,000 children born in this country 145 died without reaching the age of one year; and there were particular localities in which as many as 250, 300, or even 400 out of every 1,000 born died at that early age. It was no exaggeration to say that half of them might be saved; for the rate in some of our Colonies was no higher than seventy per 1,000, and in some of our own counties it was not higher than eighty-four. The seriousness of the question was not diminished by the fact that while the general death-rate in this country had been much diminished as the result of sanitary measures, the infantile death rate remained practically stationary. That he attributed mainly to two causes—neglect by mothers of their own health before the birth of their children, and neglect of the children's health immediately after they were born. He did not suggest for a moment that the neglect was due to wickedness or even to carelessness exactly, but it was in most cases due to ignorance, which was a far more potent cause of infantile mortality than the more commonly assigned causes of parental poverty and intemperance. Something could be done to remedy this state of affairs by the provision of skilled assistance to mothers in the early days of motherhood, and many health societies throughout the country had charged themselves with this duty. Remarkable results had been achieved in Huddersfield from the creditable efforts of the ex-mayor. But under the existing registration law six weeks might elapse before registration, and one-third of the children dying in the first year of life died in the first six weeks; so that these children were dead before the societies to which he referred could know that they had been born. It was solely with a view to remedy this defect that he had been asked to introduce this Bill. It provided that within forty-eight hours of the birth of every child a notification of that birth should be given to the medical officer of health. Notification was to be made in the simplest way, it being specially provided that it might be made by post card, and the duty of notifying a birth was thrown, in the first place, on the father of the child and, failing him, on any one who had been in attendance on the mother. The Bill further required that notification of children stillborn should be made as well as of those born alive. He urged the House to consider the seriousness of the evil the Bill was designed, he would not say to cure, but in some degree to mitigate. This was a non-Party question, and he ventured to hope that the Bill would be regarded as absolutely non-contentious. It was supported by hon Members in all quarters of the House, and he hoped its promoters would have the sympathetic support of the Government, and that the measure might be passed into law before the close of the present session.

Motion made, and Question, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the early Notification of Births,"—(Lord R. Cecil)—put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Lyttelton, Mr. Shackleton, Mr. Verney, Mr. Gulland, Mr. Masterman, Mr. Sherwell, and Mr. Tennant.

NOTIFICATION OF BIRTHS BILL.

"To provide for the early Notification of Births," presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time To-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 169.]

TERRITORIAL AND RESERVE FORCES BILL.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [9th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Which Amendment was—

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House, though anxious to increase the capacity for expansion of the forces of the Crown in time of war, regrets that the Government should make proposals which, while destroying the Militia, discouraging the Yeomanry, and imposing new and uncertain liabilities on the Volunteers, would not, in a period of national peril, provide an adequate force for Home defence or prompt support for the Regular Army in the field.'"—(Mr. Wyndham)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said that on a previous occasion he indicated that the scheme of the Secretary of State for War had been received with favour in his constituency, and particularly that portion of it which referred to the Volunteers and the Territorial Army. But since then the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean had referred to the provisions of the Bill as affecting India, and had argued that a striking force of 167,000 men was larger than was needed, seeing that we were now on good terms with Russia, whose armies, moreover, could not quickly get into India, so that in case of difficulty there would be ample time to make any arrangements that might be required for the protection of our Eastern Empire. With all due respect for the great authority of the right hon. Gentleman, he submitted that the views expressed by him were not those entertained by military experts connected with India. The voice of the right hon. Gentleman, as that of one who was, in respect of every attribute but age, an old Parliamentary hand was no doubt entitled to much weight, but so also were the views of those who spoke with great knowledge of India, and surely what was sauce for the old Parliamentarian should be sauce for the old soldier. Each in his own field was entitled to equal weight and consideration. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to look forward also with equanimity or satisfaction, to a diminution of this force of 167,000, but he submitted that in the absence of any provision for expanding it for six months after a war had broken out it was highly inexpedient that there should be any such reduction. The right hon. Gentleman had rightly said that the basis of the numerical strength of the force was the number of units actually existing at home to find drafts for India, and he had referred to the danger that existed lest the cost of the Army should lead to insistent demands for the reduction of the Navy. But he remembered that on a preceding occasion the right hon. Gentleman supported a proposal for a reduction of the Navy, and in view of that he hoped that his authority would not be given in support of reducing the striking force provided for by this scheme—a force which would not be at all too large for the next few years. The fact was that the Army at home chiefly existed for the purpose of finding drafts for India, and anyone who had not seen the Army in India had never seen the British Army. The one was the substance, the other the shadow. There was one other matter to be considered in connection with the question of reduction, and that was the effect upon the people of India themselves and throughout the East. That was very well illustrated by a recent incident. A cordon of police was placed in one of the best educated districts in India for plague purposes, and it was immediately reported among the natives that British rule had ceased to exist south of the cordon, which was designed to prevent the spread northwards of news of the catastrophe, while actually in one village the watchman went round proclaiming that a new reign had begun and that the possession of the country had changed hands. Absurd as the story was, it proved how a reduction of our Army might be viewed by the natives. We were, therefore, bound to have regard to the potential as well as the actual result of any such dealings with the British Army. The hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division had several times argued that the Cardwellian system was not suited to our requirements, but at any rate it had sufficed up to the present to keep up the supply of white troops up to the standard which was declared to be necessary immediately after the Mutiny, and had been found necessary up to the present moment. We wanted not so much great masses of troops in India, but it was requisite that they should possess staying power and power of expansion. If the House should feel that it was keeping up for the sake of India a force larger than was needed for English wants, and involving a burden greater than the taxpayer should be called upon to bear, he would beg hon. Members to remember what were the functions of the force, what it did in the South African War (when it saved Natal), and what it had done in China, Abyssinia, Tibet, Egypt, and Afghanistan. When they got down to the number of sabres, bayonets, and guns in the expeditionary force, deducting the non-combatants, it seemed after all to be very moderate in size. But the right hon. Baronet appeared to argue that this force involved enormous expenditure, and that this expense was annually growing in India. But there had, however, been a decrease of half a million in the Estimates, despite the extra outlay on quick-firing guns and officers, and the increase in the forces in India in the last few years was by no means commensurate with the increase in the area of the Empire and the increase in its population. In his opinion European troops could not be reduced in India, for we had potential enemies on frontiers now almost, including Persia, Beluchistan, and Mesopotamia, against whom provision must be made. Our Army in India was now based on the standard decided on at the close of the Mutiny; no regard had since been had to the increase of territory and population, and he would view with great anxiety any change which tended to reduce that standard. The Army in India ought not to suffer from experiments made at home, and he was glad to hear that, during the next year, there was to be no alteration either in system or in numbers in India. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean had said he wanted a democratic Army. Might he substitute the word "national" for "democratic?"

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I protest. The hon. Member is putting certain statements into my mouth and I cannot recognise any of them. When I was alluding to the Indian Army and the striking force I quoted a statement by the Leader of the Opposition in which the inapplicability of the force to India was pointed out. Again, I made no demand for a democratic Army, but I pointed out that the Secretary of State had used that term and I said I could not find it in the scheme for officering the Army.

*MR. REES said he had evidently misunderstood The Times report, but he had had the advantage also of hearing his hon. friend. He stuck to his point that this force was not too great for the calls which might be made upon it. He thought it a very distressing thing to try and introduce into this subject the question of democracy. They must remember that when war broke out every class sent its sons into the field, and in this connection he would like to quote some words by Colonel à Court Repington, who said—

> "The regular Army must retain its present place if England is governed by sane men. We must resist to the last all further attempts to reduce the regular Army at home or abroad, because it is indispensable for foreign garrisons' reliefs and drafts, and a second line Army can only supplement it and can never supplant it."

Under the Government of Mr. Gladstone, when Mr. Cardwell was War Minister, seventy-one battalions were maintained at home in order to keep up the Indian Army, and that was at a period when the Empire was neither so rich, so extensive, nor so populous as now. How then was it possible now to justify any reduction? The hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division had given a general support to the arguments of the right hon. Baronet, and if he understood him rightly he had argued that in six weeks we could under our present system of fourteen days annual training—one half of which depended on the good will of employers—get an Army as good as that of the Swiss which was based on sixty-five days compulsory training every year, and was moreover a conscript army.

MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby): If the hon. Member will forgive me I should like to say that he is misrepresenting me, unintentionally no doubt. What I said was that the Army proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would with six weeks training subsequent to mobilisation be as good as the Swiss Army.

*MR. REES said he could not even agree with that. He had consulted a good many soldiers on the point, and all experts disagreed with the view of the hon. and gallant Member.

MAJOR SEELY: It is simply a question of arithmetic.

*MR. REES said it was a military and not an arithmetical question, and depended on many factors other than arithmetic. Any attempt to represent the amateur as equal to the professional soldier and to disparage the value of and need for training was, he thought, disastrous. He must insist that with anything like our present periods of voluntary training the territorial forces of the future would necessarily need months to form and harden by training after war had broken out or after embodiment, and would not, therefore, be able to answer all the calls that might be made upon them. Further than that, the hon. and gallant Member had seemed to suggest the desirability of officers passing through the ranks as in Prussia, because he said it promoted an admirable feeling between officers and men.

*MAJOR SEELY: What I said was that if the Prussian Army was more democratic than ours it was because many officers in the Landwehr had first to serve in the ranks, whereas in our Army the number of promotions from the ranks was so small as to be a negligible quantity.

*MR. REES doubted if the system was worthy our adoption, and was amazed at the suggestion that the Prussian army was more democratic than our own. The expression in respect of an army seemed to him most inappropriate, and could, he thought, only connote the feeling to which he referred. Was the hon. and gallant Member not aware of certain figures regarding mortality in the Prussian Army? It was entirely wrong to suggest that British officers were not on good terms with their men, or that an anti-democratic feeling was rife in our Army.

MAJOR SEELY: I never did.

*MR. REES said the hon. and gallant Member suggested that the adoption of the foreign system, to wit, that of Prussia, would bring about an improvement in that respect.

MAJOR SEELY: No, no!

*MR. REES said he despaired in that case of getting at exactly what the hon. and gallant Member meant by his reference to Prussia by way of example, and would pass from that point to the Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Preston. That Amendment suggested that the Bill should not be proceeded with until we had ascertained what the Colonies would contribute to the national defence. He hoped that in view of the statement of the Prime Minister that day to the effect that the obligation of England to defend the whole Empire was undisputed the Amendment would not be moved. It would be a most unfortunate thing if that subject were raised in the House of Commons at the present moment, and he hoped the hon. Member would give up the bad habit of trying to settle everything by logic. These questions could not be settled on arithmetical or logical lines. He considered that the participation of the Colonies in any defence scheme should run on the line of each Colony defending itself, or rather perfecting its own defences, providing as far as possible its own troops, and relying on one great Navy at the centre of the Empire. He was delighted to have the concurrence of the hon. Member for Preston in that, but he would remind him of the fate of another logician, who was in the habit of proving the worse to be the better case. The Parliament of Athens sent Socrates a dose of hemlock, and he sincerely hoped the electors of Preston would not do the like for his hon. friend, whose courage he admired, and whose abilities he envied. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil had objected to the Bill because it sought to introduce militarism into our schools, and he wished to state that in the City of London there was a boys' shooting club, which apparently was approved by the boys' fathers. The parents were all asked if they agreed to their boys taking part in it. Out of 100 parents ninety-nine agreed, and there was only one parent who objected. He rather wondered that even one man objected to his son's being brought up to become proficient in such exercises. Was it necessary to kill, because one could shoot, and who was so dangerous with gun in hand, as the man inexpert in its use? The hon. Member had also said that the high places in the Army were the monopoly of the rich and well to do; but in view of the case of Hector Macdonald it was absurd to say that there were not means by which a capable man could rise from the ranks. Every boy in a humble station could not by legislation be placed in a position occupied by others as a result perhaps of generations of industry, ability and self restraint. To say he could was the idle dream of the idle agitator. He maintained that under the present system there was a ladder up which all could climb step by step. He had seen it largely used in Wales where, in his own constituency, boys had mounted to the topmost rung, but not so much in England. In the English ladder an all-important "Intermediate" rung was wanting. Still, the ladder did exist, and it was quite possible for boys to rise to the highest positions, if they were deserving of them. Then it was said that the Bill of the Government would interfere with the industrial relations between employer and employed. He did not know how that could be, but he did know that the hon. Gentlemen who clamoured most for reductions in the Army and Navy were the first to object to the discharges of men at Woolwich Arsenal. They could not have it both ways, and besides, if relief was given in one constituency by providing State employment beyond the needs of the State and not in others, it must produce considerable disappointment and dissatisfaction amongst those who were far removed from the throne of grace, or had not such powerful Members as other constituencies had. He did not see that any constituency had a greater claim in this respect than another, and would oppose any benefits not extended to the Montgomery district. Moreover, he did not see the justification for the complaint that this Bill would interfere with industrial relations between employer and employed, because 60 to 86 per cent. of the soldiers were artisans, labourers, miners, and factory hands. Then the hon. Member had said that the Secretary of State for War's scheme would create a military spirit; but it was folly to suppose that a man who shot straight wanted to kill. On this point he would like to read a communication from President Roosevelt to the Senate. The President, who was the greatest living peacemaker, said—

> "Nothing would more promote iniquity, nothing would further defer the reign upon earth of peace and righteousness, than for the free and enlightened peoples, who strive towards justice, deliberately to render themselves powerless, while leaving every despotism and barbarism armed and able to work their wicked will. The chance for the settlement of disputes peacefully by arbitration now depends mainly upon the possession by the nations that mean to do right of sufficient armed strength to make their purpose effective."

Those were words with which he would associate himself in regard to the condemnation which had been uttered of this military training in schools. He would give the hon. Member another passage from a speech of that great lover of peace and composer of differences between the nations. President Roosevelt also said—

> "We should establish shooting galleries in all the large public and military schools, should maintain national target ranges in different parts of the country, and should in every way encourage the formation of rifle clubs throughout all parts of the land."

He was not in favour of conscription, nor were his constituents, but they did believe in training the people to be capable of defending themselves and their country, and while he was on the subject of rifle ranges he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not forget that there was a district which had supplied him with many brave soldiers in the past, and which would do so in the future, and which badly needed a rifle range—he meant the military centre at Welshpool. As to the financial aspect of the question, he thought the House should not lose any financial control it possessed over the money voted under the present system for Volunteers; but while he was keen on maintaining such control it did not follow that a system of red tape should be introduced which might strangle the new system and bring about friction. Volunteer accounts differed from those of the Army, and there should be some elasticity in regard to the auditing of such accounts. The county associations, too, would not like their accounts to be audited by the War Office officials, and this work should be done, if possible, by chartered accountants. These associations, he felt sure, not being very amenable to pressure from the War Office, would accept the criticisms of these public accountants in a good spirit, and the accountants being in the habit of working for the public would not be liable to Parliamentary or official pressure. He noticed that nearly every speech that had been made expressed doubt about the finance of the Territorial Army, and he wished to express a strong hope that the Secretary of State would lay a Memorandum giving figures showing how the scheme was to be financed. If that were done it would conduce to the better understanding of the subject, which hon. Members like himself were not able to make out without assistance. The Bill dealt with a subject which was too serious to be left to experts alone, and no Member could divest himself of personal responsibility. His own responsibility was great, as he represented a district which had provided many good soldiers to the Line and to the Auxiliary Forces, and would, he hoped, continue to discharge that valuable function.

*MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD (Leicester) said that up till now much time had been occupied in listening to the opinion of experts, and in the main it seemed that one high expert had spent his time in flatly contradicting the statement made by the high expert who preceded him. This was the third Army scheme which the House of Commons had had to consider in recent years, and every Minister responsible for the schemes that had gone before had, he believed, one after another, informed the House that he was introducing his scheme with the full concurrence and support of his expert advisers at the War Office. In some ways, therefore, it was exceedingly embarrassing for amateurs like the Labour Members to make up their mind as to how they were going to vote. It was perfectly true, as the hon. Member who had just addressed the House had said, that the question of Army organisation was not altogether a question for experts; but he thought they would feel a little more comfortable in their minds if the experts who professed to know more about these questions and how an army ought to be constructed, would kindly through the life of one Ministry, and also, he might venture to suggest when one Ministry gave place to another, show some consistent point of view, and produce a scheme which, although it might vary in details, was nevertheless constructed upon the same fundamental idea as that which had preceded it. He had done his best to follow this question, more especially as the illness of his hon. friend the Member for Merthyr prevented him from being there to speak on behalf of the Party; but in his (Mr. Macdonald's) search for knowledge and consistency he found himself in the position of Japhet when he commenced his search for his father. The opinions were conflicting and contradictory, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon, if he read his speech aright, suggested that even the figures presented from actuarial sources recently in connection with the scheme were open to very grave suspicion in regard to their accuracy. All he could say by way of consolation was that that might give a glint of hope to those who wanted a further reduction of armaments—that when they saw a Labour Party in power it could go to the War Office and be able to produce a scheme dividing the Army by half, and their War Minister would be able to rise in his place on the Government bench and inform hon. Gentlemen opposite to him that his scheme for reduction of the Army to half and of the expenditure to one-third or one-fourth had been produced with the full concurrence of the experts at the War Office, in whose hands the military destinies of the country rested. There was only one thing of which he was perfectly certain, and that was that if ever the time came when a Government sitting on those benches was responsible for the production of a scheme for conscription, the military advisers at the War Office would honestly produce a scheme with which Ministers would agree, and before he sat down he was going to express the suspicion that the scheme before the House was perhaps the first stage towards that most undesirable end. He did not desire to take up the time of the House in offering expert criticisms. He was not competent to do so, but he did hope before the Second Reading of this Bill took place they might have some clear ideas conveyed to their minds on these matters. Up to the present they had not had any information of that kind and they were still in the dark. They had no guarantee that, if by any accident the present Ministry were to disappear and another Ministry were to make itself responsible for another Army scheme, within six months a totally different set of proposals would no be brought forward, and they would be asked to vote upon them. But without wasting words, he desired to say they associated themselves with the criticisms made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean as to the size of Army that was needed. They were not at all convinced that it was necessary to increase the personnel of the Army at the present time, and he thought if the officials at the War Office had been pressed a little more they would have given evidence in favour of the doubt the Labour Members felt. Surely by this time every reasonable man must have come to the conclusion that the game of "beggar my neighbour," of adding battalion to battalion because some other country had done so, or some other country threatened to do so, was ridiculous, and that the time had come to try to meet the difficulty, not by an increase of armaments, but by a diplomatic understanding as to the strength of those armaments. The Party to which he belonged was an international Parliamentary Party, charged with the task of helping to a solution this great question in every Parliament in Europe, and the Labour and Socialist Party would be betraying itself if the Labour Members allowed a Bill increasing the personnel of the Army to go through the British House of Commons without making a protest by voting against the Second Reading of the Bill. They were not in favour of "a nation in arms." It was a grandiloquent expression and looked patriotic. One had to disclaim that expression because so many people were of opinion that unless one was in favour of "a nation in arms" he was not a patriot nor a lover of his country, and did not appreciate the great traditional and spiritual inheritance that the past had given to him. He denied the accusation, which was false, because those who declined to echo that cry did so for the reason that they were convinced, by a study of the history of European countries and of contemporary politics at home and abroad, that it was not going to solve one problem that faced us as a power in the world and was not going to help us to keep the flag of the country high or to keep it clean as they desired to do. He wished to offer some criticisms on the Bill, not as a military expert, but as one who was interested in the civil politics of the country. The problem of the Army was even a greater civil problem than a military one. It was one which interested every Member of the House, even though they had not the honour of being, as he had not, an officer in the Yeomanry or Militia. The first objection which the Labour Party took to the Bill was that it virtually destroyed the civil character of the Volunteer Force. They were quite willing to admit that the Volunteers might to a large extent be open to the charge of having played at soldiering. He did not resist arguments pointing out that in its present condition the Volunteer Force was not a Force upon which we could rely in the case of invasion. They were perfectly prepared to support any proposal for improving the character and efficiency of the Volunteer Force. But that force could very properly make this claim—that it had never been appreciated by the War Office—never had a chance of showing what it could do as a Civil Force. The War Secretary sought to increase the military character of the Volunteer Force. From a legal point of view little or no change was to take place, but from a human point of view a revolution was to happen by the status of the Volunteer as defined in the Bill. The Force was now confronted by some serious obstacles which went to erect a very formidable barrier against its popularity. From inquiries he had made he did not believe the right hon. Gentleman would find that response to Volunteer recruiting which was necessary fto carry his scheme into successful operation. He hoped he was wrong in that belief, because the effect, if he was right, would be so serious that he would much rather find that his view was wrong. If this new scheme broke down there would be no bulwark against conscription. The right hon. Gentleman was like a gamester who played for very high stakes, but unlike a Scotsman, who left himself three or four chances of retrieving his first bad fortune. If the right hon. Gentleman lost he was done for, because it was absolutely impossible for him to hope to retrieve and reconstruct the Volunteer Home Defence Force on lines more free and easy and more liberal than those he had laid down in this Bill. He was like a general who was so confident that he could win a battle that he cut himself off from his base of supply. If he won it was all right, but if he lost he was annihilated, and the enemy chewed him up. As he had said, if the right hon. Gentleman's scheme broke down and the Volunteers did not enlist there was nothing between the country and conscription, and he had handed himself over to the National Service League and its propaganda. The Labour Party held a very strong objection to the county associations. They would be a union of influences mainly political and social. The county associations would change the political and social centre of gravity in our counties. He thought the right hon. Gentleman suggested that the appointment of Justices of the Peace, and some petty honours, knighthoods, and so forth, should be given to gentlemen who showed themselves active in regard to these associations.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington) said he referred to Deputy-Lieutenants.

*MR. J. RAMSAY MACDONALD said that if it was confined to Deputy-Lieutenants he could not make the point he was going to make. He had misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, and he would not pursue it. They were to have the county associations, which would be necessarily political and social, and which, when they were in full working order, would become a new nucleus of political and social influence. He was bound to say that he could not see why the right hon. Gentleman did that. From the point of view of a democratic Government, he did not see why the right hon. Gentleman should not keep his weather eye open, and suspect the operation of those organisations. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to recreate a form of militarism which did not now correspond to the industrial condition of the country; he wanted to face a modern problem with a mediæval idea in his mind. No Member of the House was more qualified than the right hon. Gentleman to see how very absurd that proposal was. Modern problems must be faced by modern methods; and the industrial basis which should be taken by the right hon. Gentleman, whatever machinery he cared to create, must be an industrial basis corresponding to existing facts, and not a basis which assumed the old-fashioned relationship between the hall and the village. He was really rather surprised, when the right hon. Gentleman was delivering his speech on the introduction of the Bill, to hear him talk of the country gentleman's relation to the village. He dealt in that speech with an idea which had gone; whether they liked it or not, they could not bring it back. His colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer had knocked another nail into the coffin of that state of things last Thursday, in introducing his Budget, and he hoped that more nails would be knocked into that coffin before this Parliament ended. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War could not indeed draw on that dead organisation, or upon a state of things which had been condemned, and would be condemned so far as it had any vitality in it; he could not trust to that as a basis on which to place the most important part of the mechanism which he brought into existence by his Bill. It ought to be modified. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take into consideration the appeal made by his hon. friend the Member for Edinburgh, who desired some sort of assurance that the county associations, at all events as at present proposed, might not be regarded as an essential part of the Bill. Then they came to the question of the officers. An interim Report had been presented the other day on the supply of officers, and he thought they had received a warning of what was going to happen. When they saw a proposal made, an exceedingly curious proposal, that officers were to be created at the London School of Economics, he thought they must have been rather more amused than edified by it. If Punch had made the suggestion, it would have been laughed at, because it was laughable. The fact of the matter was, they were getting a little bit lax in their method of discovering ability. The method they were adopting now was that any man who passed any examination apparently was able to do anything. It was really about time, in a democratic Parliament at any rate, that they showed some discrimination in that respect. He was not going to deal with the appointment of officers in the Regular Army; it did not arise that day; but if the system was bad for the Regular Army, as he thought it was, it was ten times worse for the Home Defence Force. The whole idea of the Home Defence Force was the hearth and home idea. They had never used their opportunities in giving the Volunteer Forces some interesting work to do. Every corner of the country was full of problems of defence; every little wood, every little ditch, every tree, every irregularity of the ground, presented exceedingly interesting problems for an officer who knew how to handle his men, and how to occupy them with work which would be really interesting for them to do. They had been told that this was just beginning. What he would suggest to his right hon. friend was that if he wanted a test for officers—and of course there must be a test—why not create a class for officers on the spot? Why not take a leaf out of the book of our late enemies in South Africa? Why not give the ordinary farm labourer a chance of showing what he could do as a tactician? Let them put a man down twenty miles away from his home, on a dark nigh and tell him to identify the objects so far as he could see them. Let them give him the problem of bringing in twenty men to his own house, on the assumption that an enemy was following up behind him, and, if he did it, then make him an officer. What did it benefit that a man had been to Eton or Harrow, or that he went to a middle-class school? The only test imposed by a middle-class school was that the man's father had plenty of money to pay for his education. Surely the dead hand was not going to lie heavily on His Majesty's Government—His Majesty's present Government at any rate. These were the lines to go upon instead of those of the interim Report which was simply crammed full of social prejudices. Let them strike out some other method and select their officers as the Boers selected theirs. He had seen Boer officers living in the humblest huts, and whose wives and daughters served at table—men who had added chapters to the history of South Africa that would never tarnish. These men had not been sent to universities, and they were all the better for having been kept from secondary schools. If the Home Territorial Force was to be built up on the ideas of this interim Report, and on certain clauses of the Bill, they were going to have a force for show, and not for fighting. The Labour Party wanted a force for fighting, and not for show. Their next objection was to the cadet corps. What happened was this. A youngster, a boy, a child, joined the cadet corps. They taught him certain drill, certain arts of war, and when the time came that he had to leave the cadet corps, he was sick of the whole business, and he did not join the Volunteers or the Regular Army. From the military point of view he thought that was a great danger. If they were going to depend on keen intellectual interest in this business, if they were going to create a hearth and home defence force, then let them not sicken the population too soon. Youths, after they had left the cadet corps, would consider that they had done their part, and were not called upon to enlist as adults either into a striking or into a defence force. If they followed the mind of a child who went into the cadet corps they would find that it was influenced very largely by tinsel considerations. The problem was an exceedingly simple one for it; it believed in force; candidly and honestly the child believed in force. It believed in the force of the Empire, and it was at its early age and development incapacitated from remembering the power of diplomacy, the power of peaceful means, in piloting a country successfully through dangerous situations. So, if the cadet corps was bad for military purposes and for the true military spirit, it also poisoned the springs of politics at the very source. He ventured to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that when they got into Committee he should remove this clause which made the cadet corps essentially a part of the Home Army. His final point was the relation set up by the Bill with the workshop. He thought that for the first time in the history of Volunteers, the uniform was to appear in the workshop. He thought the men in workshops would resist it. The right hon. Gentleman believed that the employers would meet him and give him facilities in order that the Volunteers might be adequately trained. He did not believe it. The condition which this Bill sought to impose was worse than conscription so far as industry was concerned. Under conscription we would have say 1,000,000 men always out of the labour market.

But those in it were steadily in it. The employer could, therefore, gauge the producing force of his workshop. But suppose they told employers that a number of their workmen were required to be taken out for ten days or a fortnight's training; such a proceeding would paralyse industry. The workshop could not go on, and especially where labour was subdivided minutely. Where a man worked through the whole process the difficulty would not be great. Let them take a boot and shoe factory, where scores of men worked apart from each other, but completing each other's work, ask the employer to allow 100 of these men to go out for ten days at a time. It would be better to close the factory doors and have a holiday during the whole period of training, because, as a matter of fact, it would pay better to do that, considering the manner in which the industry was organised. In these circumstances, an employer would be likely to object, and refuse to allow his employees to join the Territorial Force. Some employers might make it a condition of employment that a man should be a member of the Territorial Force whilst other employers would debar every such man from work under them. It was impossible for the Labour Members to move the Amendment which they had on the Paper, but they still held to it. In their opinion, the Bill sought to introduce militarism into public schools. They objected to that. It sought to make the training of officers for positions in the Army practically the monopoly of the rich and well-to-do classes. They objected to that. It sought to interfere with the relations between employer and employed—he agreed with what others had said on that point—and it gave preferential treatment to men who had been soldiers. They objected to that; and they could not possibly vote for the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): Although there are many points on which I find myself in disagreement with the hon. Member who has just spoken, I am quite sure I am in agreement with everybody who heard him when I say that the House has listened with admiration to the exposition he has made on behalf of those with whom he is associated. We listened to him with unqualified admiration, though some of the views he expressed were, I might say, almost offensive; but seldom have they been put in so agreeable and attractive a form by the representatives of hon. Members below the Gangway as they have been by the hon. Gentleman to-day. I listened to one remark of his with some alarm, when he described the condition of the landed interest and the total disappearance of the relations between the landowners and those among whom they live. I am not prepared to admit the complete accuracy of his description. He told us that a blow had been struck at them, the other day, in the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that he hoped other blows would follow. I listened to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer very closely from beginning to end, and I confess that I did not discover that it contained this attack upon the unfortunate class to which I have the honour to belong. I do not think the hon. Gentleman himself, though he may be inclined occasionally to paint our sins in deeper colours than I think are quite justifiable, will forget that we belong to that class which pays the increased death duties under the Chancellor of the Exchequer's scheme. I do not think the hon. Gentleman is right when he says that in the greater part of the country districts there does not exist to-day those old and friendly relations between the squire and his neighbours that have led to their jointly taking part in local work and in national defence; I believe that they do exist, though in an altered form, yet in a very strong degree, and that in the future, as in the past, they will lead them to do their best in regard to any well-considered scheme that may be adopted. It has been suggested in one or to speeches in the course of the debate, and also outside the House, that some, at all events, of the criticisms which have been addressed to the scheme of the Secretary of State from this side of the House had their foundation in Party feeling. If any idea of that sort exists, speaking for myself and also on behalf of those for whom I think I am entitled to speak, I may say that no Party feeling whatever has entered into any of the criticisms which we have passed. There are many reasons, but I will give two. In the first place there is a desire, almost a passionate desire, amongst those on this side of the House who have taken an interest in the problem of national defence, and realised its difficulties, to see the question raised above the level of Party politics, and to seek and find some scheme which might be regarded as offering at all events some working foundation on which might be placed eventually a really efficient and complete system of national defence. For that reason alone, therefore, there is no Party feeling in any criticisms which we offer. The second reason is that it is largely felt by many of us that the Secretary of State has given an immense amount of labour and trouble to the development of this scheme, a circumstance which should make it impossible for us to attack him as a Party opponent, however necessary we may think it to offer criticisms after a careful examination of his proposals. Therefore, I hope there will be no suggestion that in our criticisms we are actuated by other than a sincere desire to see that we get a scheme which is likely to last and to be effective. So far we know little of what the scheme of the Secretary of State is going to do. He can know but little himself, because it must be decided, as other schemes have been, by experience of its working. A great part of the work done by the Secretary of State under his proposals is of a destructive character in connection with our existing Army, and I do not at all share the view of the hon. Member for Leicester that that work of destruction has been inefficient. The reduction which the right hon. Gentleman has thought necessary is such as, I think, must have a bad effect upon the future of our Army, when regiments which have a part in our history find that their existence has come to an end. Take a regiment like the Northumberland Fusiliers, or the Warwick Regiment, whose history has been magnificent, whose record has certainly never been exceeded, and who assuredly might have looked forward to retaining to the end their place in the list of the Army. They are gone as part of the scheme of reduction. I am not going to say more than one word about that part of the scheme, not because I do not take great interest in it, but because I am anxious to say something about the territorial branch, or auxiliary branch, as it has been called, and do not wish to take up more time than is absolutely necessary. I confess that one of the great difficulties in the way of providing a sufficient army hitherto has been to find enough of both officers and men. With the inevitable surroundings of Army life, I cannot see what there is in the scheme of the Secretary of State to improve that position of things, or to give us either more officers or more men. As the immediate result of the reductions which have already been made, there will be in Aldershot, in the course of the next few weeks, fifty or sixty officers unattached, who have lost the regiments to which they belonged, and who are now wondering what will be their fate in the future. Is it likely that this will encourage other men to join the Army? Is it likely that it will lead to a larger provision of officers than we have had hitherto? It seems to me that there is every indication that this part of the scheme will be a deterrent rather than an encouragement. For that reason I say that the greater portion of the work that the right hon. Gentleman has done so far is rather destructive than constructive. Coming to the constructive part, the great Territorial Army scheme, I disagree with much that the hon. Member for Leicester said, but I think the Secretary of State must have listened not merely with interest, but with grave interest to his description of what, from his point of view, will be the inevitable result of this new system of dealing with the great Volunteer Force of the country The idea of the Secretary of State is to produce, instead of a Volunteer Army, a Territorial Army, in which are to be merged the present Militia, Imperial Yeomanry, and Volunteers. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, when he was speaking the other day, said that the real difference between the two Parties on this question was that the Government proposed to establish their Force upon two lines, whereas our policy was to establish it upon three lines. I have no objection to that description of the difference, because I believe it to be fairly accurate, and I believe myself that the three-line system is the one to which you will have ultimately to have recourse, whatever method you adopt for the organisation of the Territorial Army; because you have to deal with three totally distinct and different kinds of men and officers. I put on one side the Regular Army, the professional soldier, whether officer or man. Whether the Militia be an effective Force or not with its present position, you have in that Force and in the Yeomanry and Volunteers two classes who are totally different in every respect, and I do not believe that you will be able, certainly not by mere appeals to patriotism, to weld those two totally different classes into one single Force. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs told us that the reason for this two-line as opposed to a three-line system was to be found in economy of administration; he said it was likely to be more successful and more economical. He did not tell us in what way it was going to prove more economical, and there are already significant signs that many of the anticipated economies in connection with the organisation of the Force will have to be abandoned. We shall hear, when the Secretary of State speaks presently, what his decision is upon this matter, as no indication has been given of how these great economies are to be effected by adopting a two-line instead of a three-line system. The case I desire chiefly to put to-day is that of the Imperial Yeomanry, but before I go into that I desire to ask the Secretary of State a question which he may be good enough to answer when he speaks this evening. As he will remember, he left the position of the Irish Militia regiments and of the Irish Imperial Yeomanry regiments, the North of Ireland and South of Ireland Yeomanry, rather vaguely described in his original speech. It may be our fault, but at all events there does exist some doubt as to the effect of the scheme on the Irish Militia and these two Yeomanry regiments, and it would be a very great kindness to the officers and men connected with those regiments if the right hon. Gentleman would tell us what the precise effect of the scheme will be so far as they are concerned. What is it that it is proposed to do with the Imperial Yeomanry? I have listened to a great many speeches from the other side of the House in regard to the system instituted when we were in office, and upon the policy and action of Mr. Brodrick and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon. Whatever may have been their shortcomings in regard to the Army, I can safely say, speaking from my own experience of the Yeomanry, that those two right hon. Gentlemen did wonders for that force, that they put it altogether on a new footing, and that the Yeomanry responded, I think, admirably and honourably to the calls made upon them. What are the Government going to do? They are going, in this new territorial scheme, entirely to remodel and alter the constitution of that force. The hon. Member for Leicester warned the Secretary of State that he has put all his money on one horse, and asked what he would do if that proposal broke down and he was left without the new Territorial Army. He suggested that you are going to get men on terms very different in all respects from those under which they are enlisted at the present time. The Secretary of State has laid stress—and I think rightly—upon the necessity for sufficient training and the making of the men of this force thoroughly efficient. I do not think you can exaggerate the importance of the extra training which they are to get, and I am sure they will respond to any demand you make upon them in order to become thoroughly efficient; but there are certain conditions which, if imposed, will make it impossible for these men to join. It is sometimes said that the condition of foreign service would be very distasteful to the men. I do not myself believe that. I do not believe that if you decide to impose on these men upon joining the Volunteer Forces conditions as to service abroad in time of national stress and peril you would prevent one recruit in 500 from joining. It will be necessary to give to the men in sufficient numbers the training which they require to make them efficient. I am convinced that the experience in the future will be the same as that in the past. In the case of war these men would join for service abroad in the largest possible numbers. When the Imperial Yeomanry were called upon to find recruits in 1899 and 1900 the conditions were different. They had their wives and families and other dependents to support and it was impossible for them to leave. Many of them were farmers or tradesmen, and at any rate their conditions were such that they could not leave. But the immediate result of the reforms introduced by my two right hon. friends was to alter the character of the men who joined the Imperial Yeomanry. It was made possible for men to join because they were no longer called upon to pay considerable sums out of their own pockets. But if you require these men to pay their expenses out of their pay and allowances, if they are to be reduced to the position of ordinary soldiers on the outbreak of war, if they are to be liable for service abroad, not going in squadrons or companies of their own regiments, but in order to reinforce the Army at the front, if they are to be taken into camp for six months, I am convinced that the great majority of the men will regard these as impossible conditions and refuse to undertake a liability far more serious than they should accept. Presumably—and I believe it is the case—you get a better class of men to join these Auxiliary Forces under other conditions. I remember discussing with four or five Volunteer officers who were extremely well aware of the feeling in their battalions whether or not there should be some system of compulsory service for the Auxiliary Forces alone. They were opposed to it. They said "We get as a rule the best men in the class that provides recruits to the Volunteer Force, but the moment you make it compulsory you will have a great many men of an inferior class who will come in because they are compelled, and you will be better without them." I believe that is the view of the men themselves who join the Auxiliary Forces. They come in now because they are the very best class of men in their respective trades. I do not care whether he is a farmer, a small tradesman, a carpenter, a blacksmith, or whatever he may be, what are you going to do in regard to this condition of prolonged training in camp? The best man will have his work doubled or trebled when war breaks out, when every sort of supply is called for to double or treble the usual extent. He is the man who would be earning much higher wages than in ordinary peace time. He is to be penalised by being brought into camp, while the man who is his inferior, not only as a soldier but as a workman, is to be given an opportunity of getting increased earnings. I believe that condition will militate very seriously against your getting the necessary number of men. Now I come to the question of pay and allowances. We have heard a great deal in this debate about patriotism. We have been told that if an appeal were properly made to the patriotism of the men of the Reserve Forces they would come. Patriotism is all very well, but a man has to think of his wife and children and other dependents before he volunteers. He is engaged in civil life in a trade or other occupation, and he must think not only of what his earnings are, but of what his expenses are going to be. The old Yeoman was obliged to pay out of his pocket towards the cost of his training. Under the present system he does not do so. The pay, and the allowance given for forage for his horse, enables him not only to pay his expenses, but in some cases, if the management of the regiment is prudent, to go away with a small amount in his pocket. You are going to change all that. You are asking a man to accept the conditions of the Regular soldier. I venture to say that you are making a demand upon him which is altogether unreasonable, and which he cannot meet. Not only has he to make himself as efficient as he can in fourteen or eighteen days training in ordinary years, but, if war breaks out, he has, in addition, to live the life of an ordinary soldier in respect of his camp food, messing, etc. If you draw a comparison between the Regular soldier and the Volunteer, say, in the case of a regiment of cavalry and a Yeomanry regiment, you can realise the difference. In the case of the Regular regiment the manœuvres go on perhaps for two or three days when the soldier has hard work, and then there are two or three days off. But the Yeoman, if he is going to learn anything at all, must work every day at his training whether wet or dry, from early morning till late in the afternoon. At the present moment the first thing everybody connected with Volunteer regiments asks when he enlists is whether his work is to be that of a soldier or whether he has to do other duties which he does not care about. I do not believe that you can, in reason, make the standard of proficiency too high. But if you call upon men to discharge duties which are only discharged by soldiers in the Regular regiments, I do not believe that you will get them. I believe the numbers will fall off in a way that will startle you. Quite recently a meeting of commanding officers was held, and a series of resolutions were passed, all of which pointed in one direction. These men, after all, speak with personal experience of the work they have been engaged upon. They know what it is to get recruits. I will undertake to say that there is not a greater anxiety for a commanding officer in connection with a Volunteer regiment than the ascertaining each year whether he is going to get a sufficient number of recruits to keep his regiment up to the establishment. It has been extremely difficult in times past. I believe if the Secretary of State could see his way to leave the Imperial Yeomanry alone in the matter of pay and allowances, the force would continue to improve and increase in numbers as he desires that they should do. But if, on the other hand, you go in the teeth of the opinion, I believe, of the great majority of officers who have served in the force, and of the views held at this moment by the commanding officers and certainly by all those who were present at the meeting to which I have referred, you will only have yourselves to thank if the scheme breaks down. The figures as to the number of Yeomen and Volunteers who volunteered for service in the late war vary a little because there is great difficulty, as the House knows, in getting at them. But I believe that something like 70,000 offered to go and that over 30,000 went. I believe that if you give the men the necessary training and fit them to go abroad they will do in the future what they have done in the past. If you are going to impose these conditions which, I believe, are not necessary, you will get rid of the force. The Imperial Yeomanry have been more than once laughed at by some hon. Members who have spoken of them as men who did not work hard enough and who played at being soldiers. I regret that I am no longer on the active list, owing to age, but I make the suggestion on the part of my successor in command of my regiment, to those who think that the yeoman's life is one of play and amusement that they should get recruited in my regiment, and after three weeks' training they will come away strongly convinced that the yeoman's life is not one of play or ease. That kind of criticism comes from those who do not know what the Yeomanry has been doing during the last ten years. The hon. Member for Montgomery Boroughs said that it would be unfortunate in the way of Army reform if a scheme were adopted which would lessen the willingness of men to join the Auxiliary Forces. The Yeomanry have been given the opportunity of improving, and they have improved. I sincerely hope that in the attempt to reconstitute the Auxiliary Forces nothing will be done to damp the enthusiasm of these men in their desire to render a service to their country. If the chance were given them they would still further improve. There are not very many of them, but more can be got. They are men of the right material and with right desires. The officers of the Yeomanry have altered as much as the men within the last ten years. I venture to say that their knowledge of their duties, their enthusiasm in their work and their attention to detail are as great as anyone could conceive; and it is to them a matter of profound apprehension that the War Office and this House appear not to recognise these facts, but to be willing to run risks in materially altering the constitution of the force. I make this appeal on their behalf because they are at present, in my opinion, a useful part of our Army of Defence, and they can be rendered still more useful and valuable in the future. I am satisfied that, if you persevere with the conditions laid down in the scheme of the Secretary for War, in a short time you will lose this force altogether. The right hon. Gentleman is engaged in a great task of reforming the whole of the Volunteer Army. He is seeking to make of the different forces composing it one great force. I will not discuss the Volunteer or the Militia aspect of the case. Everybody knows that it is necessary to make some changes in the Militia; and the Volunteers want assistance and guidance, but not changes of a serious character. But I ask why, because it is necessary to make changes in two of the forces, it is also necessary to make changes in the one which has improved and which at the present time is not open to criticism? If that view is correct I hope that the Secretary of State for War will see his way to stay his hand and leave the Imperial Yeomanry as they are, subject to this, that he can impose upon them as high a test of efficiency as can be demanded by the greatest military authorities. You cannot strain their loyalty by any demand of that kind. What we ask is, that the right hon. Gentleman will not impose upon them financial conditions which will make it impossible for men to join the corps as at present, and conditions in regard to training which we believe will be not only distasteful, but destructive.

Mr. BENNETT (Oxfordshire, Woodstock) said that he had served in the Volunteers, both in the ranks and as an officer, and both in peace and in war. The hon. Member for Montgomery Boroughs, had said that during the Easter recess he took pains to go among his constituents to ask their opinion in regard to this Bill, and he found that the Volunteers in his part of the country were more or less contented with it. He was of a different opinion. He had gone into the question locally and he found that recruiting had fallen off because the Volunteers viewed some of the provisions of the Bill with distrust and alarm. Before the Bill was introduced after a lecture he had delivered to his county battalion he managed to get fourteen recruits in quite a small village; and in another village he obtained thirteen recruits. But after the Bill was brought in he went to a town of 4,000 inhabitants, and after the combined efforts of a route march, a band, and his lecture, he secured only three recruits. He asked the reasons for the change and was told that the Volunteers to a considerable extent mistrusted and felt some alarm at various provisions in the Bill. He did not think that some hon. Gentlemen realised the existing difficulty in getting recruits. There was one well-known battalion in the West of England which gave a bonus of 10s. to anyone who raked in a recruit. Of course that practice was not universal. He would give some of the criticisms of a few Volunteer friends on the Bill. The suggested abolition of the Regular adjutant was simply spreading dismay. After all, despite the eloquence of the hon. Member for Leicester, considerable weight should be given to the opinions of experienced men in regard to Army reform. He did not think that the existence in a Volunteer battalion of a professional soldier who knew his work could be seriously objected to. He was worth more in promoting the efficiency of the battalion than all the other officers put together. Another objection to the scheme was that the number of Regular drill instructors was to be enormously decreased. At present there were 2,005 Regular drill instructors, but so far as he understood, the number was to be reduced to 1,453. The Secretary of State in one of his speeches had alluded to the possibility of the drill instructor going round on a bicycle to drill different companies in a county battalion. His own opinion was that to reduce seriously the number of Regular drill instructors would reduce the efficiency of many of the Volunteer battalions. Another objection was to the rules for camp. The men might be frequently soaked to the skin during manœuvres, and they would resent being called upon on return to camp to sit the whole evening in damp clothes. The Volunteer was as proud as any Regular soldier of his smart uniform when he marched out to the admiration of his male and female friends. Then the proposed fine of £5 for failure to fulfil training conditions had caused some mischief. But the chief thing which rankled in the minds of the Volunteers was the virtual obligation to go on foreign service. The Volunteer battalions it was contemplated were to go abroad as units. The battalion would be called out on parade; the Colonel would make a speech and ask all those who volunteered to serve abroad to step out of the ranks. Anyone could see the social and other pressure which would be brought to bear on the men to serve abroad against their will. There was the ill-starred circular of 1905 which suggested that the Volunteers should be medically examined with a view to ascertaining whether they were fit to go on foreign service. In his own battalion fifty men declined to be examined. Of course it was pointed out that during the South African War one-fifth of the Volunteer force volunteered to serve in South Africa, and one-fifteenth did serve. But that was during the war fever at a time of stress. But in 1901, when the War Office invited 10,000 Volunteers, only 1,400 responded to the call. Many Volunteers had no liking for the county associations and disliked still more the prominence given to the lord-lieutenant of the county on these bodies. The Volunteers were the most democratic section of the King's forces, and they asked that instead of this official the chairman should be properly elected by the county association. Even the supply of young officers was, in the future, to be under the control of these effete county officials, many of whom were eaten up with bitter prejudices. Everybody would have thought that at all events they would have been ruled out by the Government. He protested against any public money being expended on this secondary and separate organisation until the needs of the Regular and Territorial Forces had been provided for. The objections raised from the Labour Benches had been raised on the ground of militarism, and he agreed with a good deal of what had been said with regard to boys being taught bayonet exercise under the guise of religion by a bellicose curate not being an edifying spectacle. He objected to the expenditure of money on cadet corps and rifle corps unless it carried with it an obligation on those corps to serve. The cadet corps of schools had no military value whatever. They were run principally on ginger-beer and buns. And with regard to University cadet corps, his own experience at Oxford was that when he asked men to join the corps he had been met with the statement that they had done their part at a public school and they came to the University to enjoy themselves. So far, therefore, from these cadet corps helping the military spirit, they retarded it. The rifle clubs, he submitted, were not worth the outlay expended on them at present. Many members of the rifle corps in England were senior men, and of what value were such men from a military standpoint if they could not take the field? And it would not be fair to ask them to take such responsibility. The kind of optimism shared by some supporters of rifle clubs with regard to these military facts was expressed by the hon. Member for Stoke who informed the House that, if the foot of an invader touched these shores, a million bayonets would glitter in the morning light. A General of Napoleon's once said that they could do anything with bayonets except sit on them. He thought that the glittering bayonets would, in all probability, do more damage to those who had them than to the invader. The hon. Member had also said that if the bayonets were not forthcoming the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State would be hanged. Of this he was sure—that those using the bayonets, if captured by the enemy, would be hanged. All this talk was part and parcel of the nebulous nonsense which did duty in this country for Socialism. Many Members of the House in the dining-room and the lobby and other places, having first told him that they knew nothing whatever about military problems, went on to say that invasion was out of the question. Every military expert in this country and on the Continent, on the contrary, were of opinion that, although invasion would be a difficult matter, the difficulties were not insurmountable. We in England did not face the question fairly. We must remember what the Royal Commission said with regard to the Militia, namely, that it was not in a fit condition after a training of 100 days to take the field in defence of the country. The Militia were trained for sixty-three days and then for twenty-seven, and the training the Territorial Forces were likely to get under the conditions of the present proposals would be more or less on the same lines as the training the Volunteers now got. The Volunteers were now trained for eighty hours in four years and camp was not compulsory. As to the proposal for six months' training, did any one suppose that any hostile European Power which had in its programme the invasion of England was going to hold its hand for six months before it commenced operations? Compulsion being out of the question it seemed to him that the only solution of the problem was to be found in the direction of the Volunteers. There were, of course, difficulties in the way, but it was their duty to face those difficulties and to induce the Territorial Force to undergo longer periods of training. And the only way to do that was to pay them adequately for the time they were engaged. However they were dressed or by whatever name they were called, they would still be amateurs of an inferior type, and anyone who looked at the problem from that point of view could not regard these men as an adequate security against invasion when they contemplated the difference between the training suggested for the Territorial Force and that which would have been undergone by the invaders. This problem of defence far transcended any Party limitations. Volunteers were grateful to the Secretary for War for his untiring work in the cause of Army reform and for being the first British Minister to treat the Auxiliary Forces seriously.

*MR. BRACE (Glamorganshire, S.) said that he accepted many of the conclusions of the hon. Member for Leicester, but he did not agree with him as to method or detail. It was necessary first to give this Bill a Second Reading, and then it would be possible to suggest Amendments in detail in the direction in which it was thought it ought to be amended. He felt that, if this Bill were rejected, they would be face to face with chaos so far as the Auxiliary Forces were concerned; and therefore it seemed to him and those with whom he was associated that, while frankly criticising the Bill, they were under some obligation to the House, the country, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War to co-operate with him in making his scheme successful. If he thought the Bill led them one stage towards conscription he would offer it violent opposition; but he looked on the Bill as containing the germs of a scheme which would put conscription further away, and therefore he supported it, reserving his right to amend it in Committee. After all, Britain was great because she was supreme in the arts of peace and commerce. This country would never be great because she happened to be great in the art of war. Rome as a nation had stood out among the Empires of the world as the first military Empire, but she had passed away in defiance of her military knowledge and military prowess, because she had failed to understand the true meaning of greatness. He recognised that, as long as conditions remained as they were, an Army must be maintained, and common sense told them that it must be an efficient Army. He regretted the enormous expenditure on the Army at the present moment, and he had still to be persuaded that so large an Army was necessary; but he felt that in this Bill, dealing with a Territorial Force, they were called upon to consider an altogether different branch of the question. With regard to officering the Volunteers from the public schools, he asserted that a civic force ought to be based on the broad principle of democracy. It was a mistake to think that in these days the men who would volunteer would be influenced by social position. Those who came into the Force would come in with a much better social position, owing to better education, than that which they before enjoyed, and the officer who was going to win the respect of the men he would have to lead would have to be a man capable of leading them. Therefore, every man having the ability to become an officer should be enabled to rise to the highest grade. He could see no reason why the Volunteers or the Army should be placed under martial law in time of peace. He held very strongly that if a soldier was guilty of an offence in time of peace he ought to be judged, and, on conviction, punished by the Civil courts of the land. He regarded the proposal to put the Volunteers under martial law with the greatest apprehension, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would realise that it was impossible to get men with any sense of dignity and manhood to join the Auxiliary Forces if the result was to be the loss of their civic rights in this regard. Pay was also a consideration. If the best type of working man was to associate himself with this movement, the right hon. Gentleman must see to it that it was made possible for him to come out for his training and go into camp without any outlay of money. It was not a question of making money out of it, but unless sufficient pay was given to provide for his wife and family while he was doing his duty to the nation it would be impossible for such a man to associate himself with the scheme. The military force must therefore be reduced to the smallest number, having regard to efficiency. There was every desire among the workers to be in a position to protect their beloved country from invasion, but they must move on practical lines; and it was because this Bill, instead of leading to conscription, really raised a barrier against it, and because the country was in need of some scheme of defence, that he and the group to which he belonged would vote for its Second Reading, reserving to themselves the right to amend it in details.

*MR. LEHMANN (Leicestershire, Market Harborough) desired to say a few words from the point of view of one who was opposed both to conscription and to to universal compulsory military service. Many who favoured compulsory service opposed this scheme because they did not believe that even under the conditions set forth in the Bill there would be a sufficient number of men willing to join the military force of the country. If that were so, what did they propose? They proposed not only to bring in this comparatively small number of unwilling men, but also to force in all the rest of the unwilling to make a competent fighting force. That was a most absurd proposition, and it was useless, because the country would never believe in it or sanction it by its votes. If they believed the country was with them on this question they had only to go to the country and get its sanction. He admitted that it was the duty of those holding his opinions not so much to devise a scheme for the defence of the country as to support such a scheme when it was devised; and it was because he thought that this Bill would provide a properly qualified military force for the needs of the country that he should support the Second Reading. The question was could we under the voluntary system obtain a Territorial Army qualified by its training to perform the duties imposed upon it under this scheme. We did not require an Army huge in numbers composed of unwilling men. He had spent some years in a Yeomanry regiment. He did not wear the glittering panoply of an officer. He had begun as a trooper and had worked his way up until he had been rewarded with the stripes of a sergeant. He looked back on that period as not the least enjoyable in his life. They had done some hard work, and he might give an instance to shew that the training of the Yeomanry in these days, short as it was, had yet produced men capable of holding their own even against the Regular cavalry. He remembered a case where a Yeomanry regiment, owing to the skill which they had acquired, captured the greater part of a cavalry regiment. They had twelve days of training together, and at the end of that time, owing to the admirable zeal of their officers, and not least of the Regular Adjutant, they were, he would not say qualified to bear comparison with the Household Cavalry, but qualified for most of those duties which regiments of cavalry had to undertake in the field. The spirit of that force was remarkable. He remembered the great surprise with which men after their first training received their pay. No thought of pay had entered their mind when joining, and they went into the service because they wanted military work. He believed that the Yeomanry cavalry, after the improvement which had recently taken place, were a most valuable force, and he hoped nothing would be done to check their enthusiasm. He believed it would be possible, by some slight alteration in the scale of pay, to meet all the fair demands of the Yeomanry cavalry, and thus preserve for the country a force which had done very great service in the past. They were told that under this scheme the Militia was being destroyed. If he believed that he would certainly hesitate to vote in favour of the Second Reading of this Bill. The Militia was not being destroyed, it was only being altered, and it would reappear under another name, because every unit of the force was going to be taken over. There was no sanctity in the idea of the three-line system. They had the Regular Army and the Militia. Then came the invasion scare, and in a moment the country was covered with Volunteer regiments. They preferred to remain as an independent force of their own, and in that way the third line of defence arose. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for having brought order out of chaos and for having given them the two-line system under this Bill. There were many points in which alterations in the Bill might possibly be required in Committee. He did not know that he was a very enthusiastic admirer of the county associations, but after considering it he had concluded that if they were to make a beginning at all that was the best way to begin, because they placed a Militia officer at the head of the county association and did their best to interest the great families of the country in the Territorial Force. He would like to know how many Volunteer regiments up to the present time had been assisted by the great families in the country. Those families had always taken a great interest in the Regular Army; in a small way they had interested themselves in the Militia, and the Yeomanry cavalry, but, as regarded the Volunteers, they had taken very little interest in them. The hon. Member for Leicester had told them that the old relations between the Hall and the village were things of the past He had himself had some experience of country districts, and he did not agree with the view of the hon. Member. In political matters the agricultural labourers and those who were at one time supposed to be the dependents of the Hall were perfectly ready to vote against its inhabitants, but in social matters he believed they were still glad to work with them. Although he thought that something better in the end might be devised to take the place of county associations he could not join with those who condemned those associations, because he believed they would form the foundation of an excellent system of local administration. He would not dwell upon such matters as rifle clubs, because he did not think there was much good to be got out of them and they were in no way a substitute for Volunteer regiments. There were other points upon which he might join issue, but on the whole, after carefully studying the Bill and listening to the objections brought against it, he had concluded that the right hon. Gentleman had produced a scheme which, in its essentials, would not only guard them against universal military service, but would properly co-ordinate the various forces of the Crown and give them, without any additional expense, such a system as they had been longing for for a good many years.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London): The alteration in the hours of the House must be my justification for getting up at an hour when it is not usual for the Leader of the Opposition to ask for the attention of Members. The Minister for War has a great many topics to deal with, and I do not see that it is possible for him to compress an answer to the case which has been made both by friends and foes—and, if he will allow me to say so, by friends quite as much as by foes—in the course of a rather disjointed debate, into less than an hour; and I am therefore compelled to ask the House to listen to me at a rather earlier stage of the proceedings than in other circumstances would be either useful or convenient. I rise to support the Amendment, but I do not do so in any spirit of Party feeling or with any desire to make a difficult task even more difficult than it is. I have been a close spectator, sometimes an actor, in the drama of War Office administration now for many years past. I am profoundly conscious of the difficulties which beset the path, and must beset the path, of any Minister who has to deal with an Army based upon a voluntary system. I believe a voluntary system is a system this country will never consent to abandon, and my sympathy, therefore, is perennially extended to every successive Minister of War, to whatever Party he may belong. I should like to go further. I believe the changes and reforms carried out during the last ten years in the Army have been very great reforms, as they undoubtedly have been very great changes. I believe, when the history of the British Army comes to be written in an impartial spirit, it will be admitted on all hands that Lord Lansdowne, Mr. Brodrick, and my right hon. friend the Member for Croydon have each in their turn and in their measure made a great contribution to this difficult and perennial problem. But I acknowledge at the same time that one of the things which the right hon. Gentleman has set himself to do was not done by his predecessors, and still remains to be done—I mean the problem of providing for the expansion, on the best possible lines, of the Army in time of great national necessity; and, though I do not think that we who sit on this bench have the smallest reason to be otherwise than proud of the work done during the last ten years, it would not be right for us to take up the position of critics of the right hon. Gentleman from the point of view of people who have accomplished this task, which we all admit ought to be dealt with. Therefore, the House will see that when I approach the particular solution the right hon. Gentleman has proposed to us I not only approach that question with a generous sympathy based upon my consciousness of the difficulties which beset every War Minister in this country, but with a feeling that we on this bench have a special reason for not opposing any plan which we think really does solve that part of the problem which we admit was left unsolved when we were succeeded by the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. The House has had to listen to a great many lengthy speeches—not too long, but they have been long, and they have sometimes been long because they have discussed questions which I would venture to put on one side as questions already settled, or at all events, that may be regarded for the purposes of this discussion as provisionally settled. I am not going to say a word, for instance, about the Fleet being our first line of defence, or about the possibility of invasion in great force; I am not going to argue the possibility of raids. I am going to assume for the purposes of everything I say to-day that we may neglect for the moment the possibility of invasion in great force, that we have to admit the possibility of raids, and that the Fleet cannot do its duty as the first line of defence unless there is behind it within the four shores a military force—Volunteer or other—which would make the position of a raiding force when it landed practically untenable. I am going to assume all these things, which I have argued at great length on other occasions in the House, as matters which we may assume without further discussion. As regards the Volunteers, I may perhaps be allowed to say that I have no strong views about the particular plan proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. I am quite sure that we ought to do something to organise the Volunteers better, and I am quite sure that we ought to do something to give them a general staff, to arrange beforehand how they are to meet and deal with particular contingencies which might conceivably arise in the defence of the country, and that we ought no longer to consider them as merely a large and miscellaneous force of fairly well-trained men of whom, somehow or another, in ways unspecified and in plans unmatured, we can make good use in time of national need. I think that much may be done, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman and his military advisers are in the way of doing it, and in so far as that is so he has my hearty support and warm congratulations. But I view with considerable suspicion one class of encomium which I have heard on both sides, and particularly in the speeches, naturally enough, of the right hon. Gentleman's own supporters. The hon. Member who has just sat down and the hon. Member for Leicester both congratulated the Minister for War upon having introduced order where chaos prevailed before, and it has been indicated that the military system of the country was in a confused state, that we had, as it were, a very varied and miscellaneous force, whose efficiency would be immensely increased if only we gave it a different nomenclature and a different organisation. I do not agree with that kind of praise. Remember that if we are all agreed, as we are, that for all our military forces, whether Regulars, Militia, special Reservists, Yeomanry, Volunteers, whatever they may be, we have got to depend upon voluntary enlistment or voluntary engagement to serve—remember that you must make your terms vary and your conditions of service vary with the various classes to whom you appeal. The very fact that a scheme is simple is to my mind not a priori in its favour, but against it. If I am told there is a very complicated lock to be undone, if a man comes to me and says, "I am a great believer in simplicity, here is a simple key to undo it," I say, "But you do not fit your means to your end." When you are dealing with so complicated a society as our own, depend upon it, it is not good, but bad, that your system should be artificially simplified, and that you should ignore in any way the varying needs and wishes of the classes on whose voluntary assistance you must depend for obtaining the necessary body of men to defend your interests at home and abroad. And, after all, I am not sure that the plan of the Government really deserves the epithet "simple." I do not think it is simple. You have two lines of defence now before the scheme comes into operation; are you going to have fewer lines afterwards? You will have your Regular Army now, your Militia, your Yeomanry, your special Reservists, differing in their conditions of service every bit as much as the Militia varies from the Regular Army, and both from the Volunteers. There is no simplicity introduced by the scheme of the Government. It is true they sweep away an old historic force, but they do not make the new system simpler than the old. I think we are all apt to be misled by words in this matter. If we look at things, we shall see that probably the result of this plan will be to introduce a greater variety into our system than at present, because at present the War Office does perhaps too much endeavour to run all the Volunteers into one mould. If you are going to leave the county associations really to control in any large measure the force within their respective areas, you may have a different kind of Volunteer, as you may have a different kind of county association. And my confident belief is that, if the Territorial Force as conceived by hon. Gentlemen opposite comes into existence, it will be a more varied force than the Volunteers are at present. But I do not criticise them on that account. On the question of cost the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean made a very able commentary upon the scheme of the Government, in which he indicated his opinion, on what seemed extraordinarily good grounds, that the new scheme would be much more expensive than the old one, as far as the Volunteers and the Militia are concerned. I am not qualified without expert advisers to express an opinion on that point. But it is not on that ground I propose to vote for the Amendment. I propose to vote for it upon much larger and wider grounds. I certainly have no objection in principle to the county associations, but I am very doubtful about this part of the plan. I am not sure that you have not already thrown in the counties so much work upon the only class whose leisure permits them to do it that for any new and great burden thrown upon them you would find them not unpatriotic and not unwilling, but really unable from sheer want of time to carry out the new functions proposed to be placed upon them. The extremely able speech, I am bound to say, of the hon. Member for Leicester suggested to me a new doubt as to the wisdom of the course suggested by the Government. The hon. Member said that the trade unions, the organised labour throughout the country, would strongly object to a large number of the provisions and ideas in the right hon. Gentleman's plan. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Leicester has better means of judging than I have, but the mere fact that a representative of the Labour Party in this House should be in a position to say that shows conclusively that if you do start these county associations you will have, and must have, introduced into it an element which I do not call Party, but which I may, without offence, call an element of social controversy. You will thus have in the very bosom of the new county associations an element of discord introduced which would be absolutely disastrous to the real success of the Volunteers. So far the Volunteers have had their rows; they have had their perennial row with the War Office; they have had their controversy with the military experts; but they have had, apart from these, which are almost an essential part of their being, great liberty and autonomy. Henceforth the various regiments, as I understand, are to be largely under the control of the county associations. The county associations themselves would be placed in such a position that controversy of a difficult and acute kind must needs break out; and this must react on the future organisation of the Volunteers in a manner that, in my judgment, cannot be otherwise than disastrous. I earnestly commend that particular danger to the right hon. Gentleman. And there is one other danger, not, perhaps, quite so serious, which should not be lost sight of. I have told the House that one thing I am afraid of is that there will not be found men of sufficient leisure in various county areas to deal with their new duties. In some counties there is a leisured class, estimable, public-spirited, in every way admirable, but I am not sure that they are admirable for the particular purpose—I mean the retired soldier. He will really have a claim to take part in the management of the work of the county associations. He will have the leisure and the technical knowledge, but I am not sure that the spirit he brings from his training with the Regular Forces is of a kind which will make him in every respect the most sympathetic or competent adviser of the Volunteer Force; and I have a little fear, not only of the trade union element introduced in its councils, if I may be allowed to say so, but also of the professional element which in certain cases will take part in their deliberations. I pass now from the civil side of the Volunteer reorganisation to what I may call the military and the formal side. On the military side the right hon. Gentleman has introduced a kind of uniformity extremely pleasing to the theorists, and by the nature of which all the Volunteers of the country are to be organised in divisions with their proper complement of cavalry and artillery. That scheme looks beautiful on paper; but is it going to help us with the Volunteers? I am not sure, and I will tell the House why. In the first place, are you sure that in a particular divisional area you will find the requisite variation of taste which will give you the number of men anxious to serve in your infantry and Yeomanry, and who will undertake the work of learning to be trained as gunners in a battery? If you do not, you will be doing exactly what should not be done, for you will be forcing into undesired and unexpected moulds the Volunteer elements which otherwise you have at your disposal. I do not see what you are going to get by it. You are going to drill in divisions, but I do not suppose they will go into action in Volunteer divisions, and if you do, then I confess that all the criticisms passed on the Volunteer artillery seem to me to be left wholly unanswered. I do not think we ought to pretend that we have the plan of what is called a national army if the artillery, from the nature of the case, is, and will always be, inadequately trained. An hon. friend, one of the Members for Hampshire, pointed out that the best Volunteer artillery regiments had an immense proportion of Regular officers, and I do not believe, without a very large infusion of Regular officers and highly-trained professional gunners, you will ever get Volunteer artillery to meet on anything approaching equal terms the highly-trained artillery of foreign nations. If that is so, it is really idle to arrange your Volunteers into divisions, if by arranging them in divisions you expect them to become great self-supporting military units—units which can provide infantry, artillery, and cavalry. They will not do so, and when I have had to consider the problem of home defence against raids it has always been on the supposition that the artillery will be supplied from the Regular Army. From the Regular Army I am convinced it must still be supplied, if any good work is to be done in the matter. It may be said, however, that I, perhaps, ignore the six months training which the Bill provides with such material as we have in the Volunteers, and that truly an immense amount of good can be got out of the finest and most teachable material in the country. Are we not here again indulging in illusions? I believe that the arrangement in divisions from the fighting point of view is an illusion, and in the same way is not the six months training when war breaks out an illusion also? The question put by my hon. friend the Member for Fareham is one to which no answer has been given. My hon. friend asked: When war breaks out do you expect the Volunteers to go into camp for six months; and if you expect this, will your expectations be fulfilled? Do you expect the employers in moments of danger to say to their men, "The country is in peril; go into camp for six months"; and my hon. friend asked the Government whether, as the largest employer of labour, they were going to do that—whether they were going to tell their employés who belong to Volunteer corps that they should go into training for six months when war breaks out? The Government are not going to do that, and they would be grossly neglectful of their duty if they did do it, because a large number of men would be serving their country more effectively by working in the factories and in the Government departments and in carrying out the great work of civil employment, which, after all, is the necessary background of any military endeavour whatever. If it is true of the Government, is it not then going to be true of the enormous number of great employers of labour in the country? There is no possible answer to the argument of the hon. Member for Leicester. He pointed out that under the terms of conscription you could, without disorganising labour, make enormous drafts on the manhood of the country because the employer knew exactly what he wanted. Every one in Germany, for example, knows that every adult of good physique between certain ages will be called upon to do military service, and knowing that he makes his arrangements accordingly. But if you organise your factories and workshops on an ordinary business basis, and then when war breaks out you suddenly find that a foreman in this department, an expert in that department, a clerk in a third department, have to go into camp for six months, there is a disorganisation of labour, compared with which the loss of labour under compulsory service sinks into insignificance. The hon. Member for Leicester put that point with extraordinary force and clearness; but no answer has been given to it, and I do not believe that any answer can be given. If that is so, are we not cherishing a pure illusion when we draw a picture of the country being suddenly covered with camps and every man of the age included in the Territorial Army leaving his employer and going out to train for six months? It cannot, will not, and ought not to be done; and therefore do not let us assume that we are creating a system under which it will be done. Nothing can be worse for us than to cherish illusions of this character and to suppose that we are creating that which cannot be created, and which, if we could create it, ought not to be created. When the right hon. Gentleman creates a Territorial Army it is not that a million bayonets may flash in the sun because some invader has landed. It is that he may find some machinery for feeding, in case of a great war, the Regular forces of the Crown outside these shores. That is his object. I do not undervalue the Volunteers from that point of view. They did good service in South Africa, and nothing in this Bill that I can see is likely to make the Volunteer more anxious to serve abroad in future wars than he was in the South African War. On the whole, I believe that that war had the warm sympathy of the classes from which the Volunteers are drawn, and I do not believe that you will get a larger proportion of Volunteers to help you abroad in future than you have had in the past. If the right hon. Gentleman can point out anything in the scheme which is going to give a larger proportion of Volunteers serving abroad either as drafts, Regular battalions, or new units, it will have my hearty support; but so far I have wholly failed to find it. While, therefore, I have no vehement objection to this part of the scheme in principle, I am afraid that it will, if carried out, give us an illusory organisation and not a real organisation, the image and pretence of a great Army complete in all its various departments, and not in reality an Army capable of meeting other Armies on equal terms, and that it will introduce in the local management of the Volunteer forces some elements of social controversy and discord which happily have hitherto been wholly absent from their counsels. I now come to the more important part, from the second line to the first line of the Army service. All of us admit that we have a great responsibility and that we must have an Army. I am not going to quarrel about the size of the Army. I see nothing to quarrel with in the general view which the Government hold as to the magnitude of the interests we have to protect and the magnitude of the force we should have to protect them. What are the conditions preliminary to having such a force? I do not know whether my enumeration exhausts them, but there are three which ought never to be forgotten. We ought to be thoroughly provided with all those elements in our force which cannot be improvised. There are some things which I believe, with the Member for Abercromby, you can get under great pressure, not perhaps of the best, but of good quality, pretty quickly; but there are some things you cannot get, and you must not think you can get. You cannot get a trained staff, or highly trained and competent officers. You cannot under any circumstances get either guns or gunners; they all take time. And I would venture to say you cannot even get, or it is very difficult to get, adequate cadres. Starting a new regiment is a very serious responsibility; it ought only to be brought into life with caution, and ought to be destroyed only after careful consideration. That is the first condition. The second is that you should have a sufficient number of units; that follows. The third thing is, you must have a sufficiency of drafts, and other means of repairing the tremendous wastage of war, a wastage which in some climates is horrible to think of, but which we must not blink, but must steadily face when we are considering what is necessary. Having laid down those three conditions, which I do not think will be dissented from, I ask myself how the policy of the Government has dealt with them. I am not going to deal in detail with the regiments in the Regular Army, but I must be allowed to say that that policy has destroyed three of the things which I say can hardly be improvised. It has destroyed ex hypothesi, and from the nature of the case, a number of cadres. That is what the reduction amounts to in the main. It has thrown out of employment—practically limited the number of officers whom we shall have; and, above all, it has reduced the artillery. I frankly admit that I complain of the right hon. Gentleman's method of treating the artillery in all his speeches. I believe it to be perfectly true that he has done a good deal to improve certain classes of men and officers who have worked in the artillery, but nothing can get over the fact that he has diminished their number by 4,000.

MR. HALDANE: I have said that I intend to do it as soon as I can organise the divisional brigade ammunition columns for the purpose, but as these have not been organised yet not a man of the 4,000 has been taken off.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am discussing the plan of the right hon. Gentleman, and I thought the plan was to diminish the artillery by 4,000.

MR. HALDANE: By substituting a larger number trained on a Militia basis; but, as I said, I have not yet been able to work that out.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the right hon. Gentleman will see the point. His plan to increase those services connected with the Militia which can be properly worked on a Militia basis may be very desirable, but those are the very things which can be improvised, provision for which is not absolutely necessary in time of peace. But the trained men whom he is going to get rid of cannot be improvised, they will not be given you by six or even twelve months training when war breaks out, and I fear, therefore, in that connection that he has not carried out one of the most important canons which I have ventured to lay down. I put the artillery in the very first rank of the things you cannot improvise. One other point. There is a controversy between my right hon. friend the Member for Croydon and the Government as to whether we shall really possess 115,000 Regular first-class Reservists. The right hon. Gentleman opposite was good enough to speak to me privately, and to assure me of what I did not need to be assured, that he had done his very best to prepare an accurate statement, and he used some arguments of a very interesting kind. But since then this plain point has been brought to my notice by my right hon. friend the Member for Croydon, which I think every one in the House will understand. The actual first-class Reserve at the present time is 113,000 men, broadly speaking. That Reserve is the product of a Regular Army which is larger by ten battalions that the Army of the future, and which was organised on a three and nine years basis, which, of couse, produces Reservists much faster than would the new Army. Yet we are asked to believe that a smaller Army on a less rapidly Reserve-producing basis is going to give us bigger Reserves than the one which now exists. And remember that these regiments which have only produced 113,000 men at the present time have been in existence seven or eight years, a period long enough to give the full measure of Reservists. How on earth is it possible for the Army of the future, differing for the worse in every particular from the Army of the present as far as Reserve-producing is concerned, to produce a bigger first-class Reserve than the present Army? That is a very great difficulty, into which I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will inquire, and I hope his reply will be as clear and brief, if possible, as has been the argument which I have respectfully addressed to him. I come to the way of dealing with the Militia. The right hon. Gentleman who preceded me said the Militia were not destroyed; they were only transformed. Sir, they are destroyed, and destroyed for the very purpose for which the Militia really exists; and the Government do not pretend that these Militia battalions, transformed into Volunteers or territorial units, are going to perform the function in the future which the Militia has performed in the past. Are we wise to abolish the Militia? I think we are not wise, and that not for historical but for strictly military reasons. The hon. and gallant Member for Abercromby admitted that the Militia had done admirable service in South Africa, but said they did it, not because they were Militia, but because they were Englishmen. Sir, they did admirable service, not because they were Englishmen, but because they were Militia; if they had not been organised as Militia battalions, they could not and would not have done the kind of service which we asked from them, and not in vain, when that great national crisis occurred. The war broke out at the end of 1899, and before April, 1900, was concluded we had got thirty-five Militia battalions out of the country taking the place that would otherwise have been occupied by Regular units. That was an almost incalculable advantage. The Militia are perfectly ready to take the obligation to go abroad, and I think everybody would support a Bill throwing that obligation on them. But you are deliberately going, nominally in the interests of efficiency, to deprive yourself of that which cannot and will not be given you by your seventy-two new battalions of special Reservists. I do not criticise the constitution of the new battalions of Reservists, though I think there are criticisms that might be passed on them; I content myself with one comment—that they cannot be used for the very purpose for which they are most required. The Government say that drafts are what we most require, and that unless they are given a machine which will provide drafts they must abolish everything useless for that purpose. The right hon. Gentleman is a disciple of the Cardwell scheme, a greater believer in it perhaps than I am myself. The Cardwell scheme was that when the two twin battalions were sent abroad a large depot should be formed which should feed those two battalions in the field, and that is, I believe, one very good way of dealing with the question of drafts, which I quite admit has to be dealt with. But in order to deal with drafts in a way not contemplated in the Cardwell scheme, are you seriously, in cold blood, going to abolish regiments which do the duty of Regular troops in certain situations? If we had, through some unhappy fate, to defend the North-West Frontier of India, your Militia battalions would take the place of Regular battalions in garrisons in the Mediterranean; some of them might even take the place of Regular troops in the heart of India itself. The very existence of this force, especially reformed and modified as it ought to be reformed and modified, would enormously increase the efficiency of your Regular Army, because it frees your Regular Army to do that which only Regular troops can do, and it puts troops less efficient and less costly to do less important work like guarding the lines of communication. It is impossible for me to believe that that does improve the efficiency of the Regular Army, and that it does improve our possibility of waging a great war. It does not. I agree that the problem of reforming the Militia, which will have to be undertaken as an alternative to this scheme if it is abandoned, is a very difficult problem. But do not let us put it out of our power to reform the Militia by destroying the Militia itself. In the great wars in which we have been engaged in the past, the work of the Militia in our own lifetime has been done by the Militia cheaply and efficiently. No one who has had experience of these great wars would say that that work could or ought to be done by the Regular Army. If the Volunteers do not do it the Special Reservists cannot do it. The Special Reservists are not intended, and are not organised, to go abroad; their whole theory is that they cannot fight as units. The only thing that is left then is the Militia, and the Militia you intend to destroy. These are the reasons why I feel that I cannot be responsible, directly or indirectly, for the plan of the Government. Even by the friends of this scheme it has been admitted that the Government are risking the very existence of the Volunteers. It is admitted even by those who have asserted with the most ardour that they will vote for the Second Reading, that unless the terms of the Yeomanry engagement are changed the Yeomanry will go; and unless the severity of the discipline in the Bill be altered the Volunteers, even if they do not go, will at all events cease to come. Your scheme, therefore, threatens your home Army—what you not very accurately call your citizen Army; it destroys drafts for your Regular Army; it throws upon Regular units responsibilities and labours which ought to be undertaken by a less costly and less highly-trained force, and which there is no possibility of this House ever consenting to see carried out by an augmentation of the number of the Regular battalions in the service of the country. If that view be accurate, however anxious we may be—and we are all anxious—to help the right hon. Gentleman in carrying through any well-considered scheme, I think he will feel with me that we on this side of the House have no choice but to take the only constitutional method of dissociating ourselves from any responsibility for this schene which, with so much ability and faith, he has developed before us, by voting for the Amendment of my right hon. friend.

* MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.) said he would not have ventured to intervene in the debate, in which so many experts had taken part, especially men who were engaged with the recruiting of the Auxiliary Forces of the country, had there not been one particular point in the Bill in regard to which he had a certain amount of personal experience and of the extreme importance of which he was thoroughly convinced. The point upon which he wished to speak had reference to the artillery and especially in regard to one department of it, the recruiting of the drivers of that force with a view of replacing the wastage in war. As he had said, his only excuse for troubling the House was that he had had practical experience in the French Army of driving guns. He knew what it was to drive a gun, and he wished to speak upon certain points of which he had knowledge, the first being the great importance of having a sufficiency of trained artillery drivers, and the second was to urge the supreme importance of that particular arm. This latter point was the one upon which he wished most to insist. The one great war of modern times in which the opposing forces were nearly balanced in numbers and intelligence, the only war of that character which had taken place in Europe recently, was the Franco-German War of 1870. If they considered that struggle it could be proved that it was the superiority of the German artillery which decided the decisive actions. He would be prepared, were the task a sufficiently useful one, even with regard to actions he had not closely studied, to say beforehand, from his intimate knowledge of that great campaign, that it was the artillery which decided the whole thing. He would take one particular example, that of the fight before St. Privat on the 18th August. The strategical effect of that battle was this. If the two main French armies could have effected a junction it would probably have changed the current of the war, but their junction was, after three days fighting, which were known collectively as the Battle of Gravelotte, prevented by the taking and capture of the village of St. Privat by the Germans. From half past ten in the morning till dusk of a summer's day practically the whole of the fighting was done by the German guns which were directed against the French position at St. Privat. It was this last bit of fighting before St. Privat, in which the French artillery was outclassed by that of their opponents, that did more than anything, in a battle which decided the fate of Europe, to influence the fortunes of the day. The guns did the work. He knew very well that there was a certain amount of prejudice, not among the learned Army experts, but among the journalistic experts in regard to the full value of artillery. One was told that it made a noise, and it certainly did do that. Then one was told that the effect of it upon any Army was only a moral one, but it would be found that in the best Army schools, certainly in Italy and France, and at last even in Germany, the importance given to artillery to-day was overwhelming. In this country, however, a long succession of campaigns fought against enemies who, though by no means despicable, were not armed with guns, and which were fought under conditions in which we should never fight in Europe, had left in us something of a prejudice against the value of artillery. He, however, was convinced personally by his reading and experience, and by the traditions of his family which were not slight, that notwithstanding the considerable changes in artillery during the last thirty years, there still remained as one of its most important elements the simple human factor, the driver. The gunner who laid the guns had varied in his importance, but the driver must be highly trained, and there should be a sufficiency of that class. Although the functions of the gunner had altered, those of the driver remained the same to-day as in the past, and he was often in greater demand than he was before and was put into a position of greater danger. The driver always had to be fairly near his gun, otherwise the carrying of ammunition to it would be cumbrous. We certainly, if unhappily we became engaged in a great war, would be involved in a very heavy loss indeed if we had not a sufficient number of trained drivers for our guns. This was a matter of which a man could only speak from personal experience, and he said that to drive a gun was an exceedingly difficult matter. Three men had to deal with six horses, each leading one and riding another, drawing a gun weighing about two tons, and it had to be taken through all sorts of country. He could not describe to the House what it meant to go through a small ditch with a hedge on the other side, with two tons behind one, leading one horse and riding another. It was a work which no amateur could undertake; it required special training for years. He himself had never been allowed to take charge of the wheelers or the leaders, but had only had the other horses, and he had never heard of any man being made a competent driver of the wheelers or the leaders who had not had at least two years experience and training of a very arduous sort. Even these two years stood for training very difficult to give under Volunteer discipline, and which could only be given under the conditions which conscription afforded. We had at the present moment the heaviest field gun in the world, the 18-pounder. It was a matter of some importance as to whether we had done right or wrong in choosing so heavy a type, but anyhow we had behind the horses a greater weight than any artillery in Europe, and we wanted if anything greater skill added to that which we had at this moment. So important and minute was the proper training of a driver that if possible a man should be got to know his horses, and, save for feeding them, which was done by the stable guard, should learn to know his horses by every method in which man and horses could be kept together, in order to become acquainted with each other. They should be kept together throughout. The losses among these trained men would be immensely heavy at the beginning of a war, and where that occurred it was utterly irreparable unless we had a very large trained Reserve. At the battle of Sedan the battery to which he was subsequently attached lost every commissioned and non-commissioned officer except one non-commissioned officer who saved his piece. The proportion of loss in killed and wounded, officers and men, upon that occasion was 75 per cent. Artillery duels would be even more serious now than they were in 1870, and if the loss was irreparable we should lose the pieces and the battle. If it was said that our military system, historical tradition, and social condition, were such as to make us largely rely on auxiliaries who were only partially trained, there was the example of Austria which also depended to some extent on a Reserve not trained. But the great Reserve of Austria-Hungary was the artillery, and the artillery was well trained and was jealously reserved for the profession. There was another and sentimental aspect of the matter, an aspect that ought to be dear to every Englishman. English drivers at the present moment had deservedly the highest reputation in the world. Service, long service, and tradition had been responsible for that, as also the fact that their officers escaped the regimental system. The regimental system did not obtain in the artillery, and promotion was out of a larger body. They had that reputation in foreign armies. During a period when foreign opinion was directed with peculiar bitterness against this country he heard in a foreign tongue enthusiastic praise of the action of our drivers at Colenso. There had hardly ever been a more gallant act than that of Lord Roberts' son and his comrades. They did not get a thing like that done unless there was a magnificent professional tradition behind it. He did not believe they could get a reserve of drivers trained on a Militia basis worthy and able to take the place of the trained drivers we should lose at the beginning of a great war.

*MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) said that on broad principles he was entirely at one with the right hon. Gentleman, but when they went further he did not agree. In the last few years several doctors had prescribed for the Army, and now the right hon. Gentleman had come along and said it had been treated quite wrongly, its system had been built up too much, and what was required was a little lowering medicine together with a little amputation. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would have been wise in considering this scheme if he had realised that these constant changes had had a very bad effect in deterring fathers from sending their sons into the Regular Army. They had also had a prejudicial effect on the Auxiliary Forces in preventing recruits from joining. The Bill, however, was before the House, and, that being so, it must be considered. When the right hon Gentleman came down and said that for fourteen months he had not scorned to live laborious days, and that this was the scheme his labours had produced, it behoved the House to give the Bill a respectful consideration. The right hon. Gentleman had informed them in one of the numerous memoranda with which he had inundated the House that he aimed at having a force of 300,000. He had, therefore, reduced the Auxiliary Forces by 74,000 men, and was apparently saving a million sterling. That was no doubt gratifying to those who considered that we ought to reduce our expenditure at all hazards. It was not so to him. But the right hon. Gentleman had quite forgotten that these auxiliaries would require guns, equipment, drill halls, rifle ranges, and other things, all absolutely necessary, and finally there was the expense of the cadet and rifle corps. That, according to the right hon. Gentleman's own statement on the 25th February, would entail a cost of £1,500,000, which, added to the £2,900,000, came out at £4,400,000. So that what the right hon. Gentleman had really done was to reduce the Auxiliary Forces by 74,000 men and increase the cost by £400,000. What was his proposal with regard to the Yeomanry? At present we had 26,000 effective Yeomen recruited from a class of men nearly all of whom had a grammar or higher school education, who with sixteen days training had picked up a surprising amount of knowledge, and who surprised the inspecting officers by the excellence of their work Their pay was now to be decreased to an alarming extent. The Yeomanry did not go out to make money, but it was quite a different thing to ask them to come out and serve the country and pay for it out of their own pocket. The right hon. Gentle man had said he proposed to relieve the financial liabilities of the commanding officers of the Volunteers, and start them fair to do their work. That was a most excellent proposal, but why should the commanding officers be freed, and the wretched Yeomanry and Volunteer privates docked of their pay? They were to be paid a sweating wage, and the result would be that only an inferior class of recruits would be obtained. It would be impossible to keep up the Yeomanry with such inferior material. He would say very little about the Militia, as their case had been so well put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover. But he must say one word with regard to what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby division, in reference to obtaining recruits for the Militia. He knew that it was difficult to get recruits, but the hon. and gallant Gentleman had said that the only place where recruits could be found was among the miners of the north of England and in Scotland. Did the hon] and gallant Member recollect that there was a large floating population in London who filled the ranks in a great many of the Surrey, Middlesex, and Home County regiments? Had he considered the miners in South Wales, who formed some excellent engineering corps? Above all, the hon. and gallant Member had shown a surprising ignorance of the conditions in his own constituency. Had he ever heard that there were 30,000 dock labourers in Liverpool, of whom only 15,000 were in permanent employ; a great many of whom, with others, had joined the Militia regiments, of which they were very proud? The steamers which sailed out of Liverpool had a large number of stokers on board, many of whom spent their annual holiday by joining the Militia regiments, getting the benefit of the fresh air and good food while out training. He thought he had shown that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had made a rather sweeping assertion. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman was not a very popular one, because it made scrap heap of this old and historic force, which did such good work not only in the Peninsula and the Crimea, but in South Africa. Then he passed to the Volunteers, to whom the right hon. Gentleman offered pay ludicrous in amount. For fifteen days training the Volunteer was to have the magnificent sum of 1s. per day. Let them take the instance of a married man in a London corps. The majority of men in London corps were married men, and the average of their families might be taken at two each. He took for illustration the case of a married man with a wife and two children, and in receipt of 35s. a week. What would be his budget for a fortnight? He would have to pay, say 5s. a week to lodge his family, and he would have to provide 10s. a week to feed them. Therefore if he was fifteen days in camp he would have to find 30s. What did the right hon. Gentleman give him? He was going to give him 15s., therefore the Volunteer would have to find 15s. out of his own pocket for his wife and children, have absolutely nothing for himself, besides losing his wages. Was not the idea ludicrous? They were dealing not with a conscript Army, but with free and voluntary enlistment, and if men were not given money they simply would not come. Last year the corps which he had in his mind gave each man 2s. 6d. a day out of the 5s. capitation grant. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean had said that in some cases as much as 4s. a day had been given, but the average was from 1s. 6d. to 3s. In the corps which he was talking about it was 2s. 6d.; therefore the man got £1 17s. 6d., out of which he had to pay 30s. for lodging of wife and children, leaving him 7s. 6d. in hand—6d. a day to provide himself with tobacco and a drink of beer after the day's work or any little thing that might be necessary. But under the conditions which the right hon. Gentleman proposed it was perfectly impossible to suppose that any man would join. Next he wanted to draw the attention of the House to Sections 6 and 8 of the Bill, because they seemed the most extraordinary sections he had ever come across. He had taken legal opinion upon them, and it bore out his view that if a man in Hampshire, say, wished to join, he could go to the recruiting officer and say he wished to join the Territorial Army, but he would not be allowed to say that he desired to join any particular regiment or even branch of the service; he had absolutely to join for general service. A successful cross-country rider might apply to join the Territorial Army in some particular Yeomanry regiment and he might be put into a foot regiment. Did the right hon. Gentleman realise that recruiting at the present moment was not by regiment or battalion but by company? A man would say that he wanted to go into Captain So-and-So's company. Now they were going to ask him to enlist in an Army corps for the county, and the right hon. Gentleman was also going to take power to transfer him after he had joined. After having been in the Yeomanry for two years, a man might be transferred to the infantry. The only protection he had was that he was not to be transferred from Hampshire, say, to Essex or Surrey. Except in that respect, he might be moved about at the will of the War Office. He thought that Members of the House would see the absurdity of the proposal. Was anybody going to enlist under such conditions, especially when they remembered that in the Regular Army a man could enlist into a particular regiment? He would not deal with the question of Regular adjutants, because he took it that, after what was said by the hon. Member who sat behind the right hon. Gentleman on the last day the Bill was discussed, that part of the Bill had been practically abandoned. Finally he came to the point which he especially wished to bring before the House, and that was with reference to Clause 12 of the Bill, which said—

> "Any part of the Territorial Force shall be liable to serve in any part of the United Kingdom, but no part of the Territorial Force shall be carried or ordered to go out of the United Kingdom."

That carried out the idea that the Volunteer Force was intended for home defence; but the clause went on to say—

> "Provided that it shall be lawful for His Majesty, if he thinks fit, to accept the offer of any part or men of the Territorial Force, signified through their commanding officer, to subject themselves to the liability to serve in any place out of the United Kingdom."

That perpetuated a statute to which, personally, he had always objected when it was applied to the Militia. The truth was that the State, when it enlisted a man, ought to tell him what exactly was his liability. A man for family reasons might not want to serve abroad, though perfectly willing to serve at home. Now the right hon. Gentleman proposed that, when the first class Army Reserve was called out, the whole Territorial Force should be embodied for the period of six months. That embodiment was not chiefly intended to meet raids and invasion, because if it had been meant for that the right hon. Gentleman would have given himself power to call out a portion only of the Territorial Force, as it was obvious that in case of a war with Russia it would not be necessary to call out the whole of the Territorial Force in order to repel an invasion or a raid. Our fleet could guarantee us against that. But he believed that they might consider that the embodiment of the Territorial Force for six months was entirely to fit them for service outside of the United Kingdom. If that was so, he did not think that it was right that they should pass the Bill in the form which the right hon. Gentleman wished, because it would be enlisting men under one set of rules, and asking them to carry out something quite different. The better plan, it seemed to him, would be that, under the direction of the War Office, every county association should have the power to ear-mark certain units within their association who should be composed of men who, when they enlisted, expressed themselves as willing to serve abroad when the First Class Army Reserve was called out; the remaining units should not be called upon to serve abroad as units, though individuals might volunteer from them for foreign service. He could not see why that could not be carried out; why should they not allow the Militia and the Yeomanry to form these foreign service units in the Territorial Army? They knew that both the Militia and the Imperial Yeomanry were ready to go abroad in their units if called upon. When they merged into the Territorial Force, why should they not allow them to consist entirely of young men willing to serve abroad in a grave national emergency, and let them be reinforced if necessary from the home battalions in order to bring them up to strength? The advantage of such a proposal was that the right hon. Gentleman would know what number he had to rely upon in case of emergency. Had he now the slightest idea of how many of the proposed Territorial Force would volunteer for Foreign Service in case a war broke out? If it happened to be a popular war he might get a large percentage of them, but if it should turn out unpopular, then the percentage would be very small indeed. Another advantage would be that a man perfectly willing to serve his country at home, but perhaps for family or business reasons not willing or able to serve abroad, would be able to enlist, secure in the knowledge that if war broke out he would only be called upon to serve his country against foreign invasion. It might be said that such people belonged to stay-at home battalions, and they would possibly be laughed at. He was aware that this had been said when the proposal was made to have two active service companies in each battalion, but there was a very great difference between two companies in a battalion and keeping a regiment of that kind in each county. They might include the Militia, the Yeomanry, and the Volunteers in this Territorial Force, and lay down that the Militia and Yeomanry should take on the liability to serve abroad, leaving the Volunteers as at present to come forward to defend their hearths and homes and have a saving clause that the Volunteers or the stay-at-home people should be allowed to Volunteer as individuals, but not as units, in order to supplement the foreign service battalions. He considered that unless the Bill was very greatly changed in Committee it would have most disastrous results, and the upshot would be that the Regular Army would be reduced by 20,000 men, the Yeomanry by 50 per cent., the Militia would be abolished, and the Volunteers irritated and discouraged.

*Captain KINCAID-SMITH (Warwickshire, Stratford-on-Avon) said he would like to make an allusion to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman first of all sympathised with the Secretary of State for War in the extreme difficulty and complexity of his task. He also stated that his three predecessors at the War Office had not been able to do one thing, and that was to provide the expansive system required, and he further stated that the present Secretary of State for War had also failed in that respect. Personally he did not agree with that statement, and he was supporting this scheme because he believed that for the first time they were taking a step towards providing that reservoir of men and that Reserve which was required to reinforce the Regular professional Army in times of emergency. Whether the Territorial Army was to be filled by Volunteers or by compulsion, it was the first step towards providing that essential condition always insisted upon by the Leader of the Opposition in any scheme of Army reform. With regard to the remarks made by the hon. Member for Leicester, the first part of his speech seemed to be one long complaint against the military side of the War Office. He complained that various schemes had been brought down to the House, and each time the Secretary of State for War had stated that they were backed by expert military opinion. The answer to that remark was the extreme difficulty and perplexity of the problem which they had to solve. What was now placed before them was one of the alternatives, and every alternative must be tried. There was not a single scheme which could be put forward by any member of the Labour Party or by anyone else which could not be picked to pieces in five minutes by the Leader of the Opposition, and probably by any other Member of the House. The hon. Member for Leicester's chief complaint against the scheme was that it would increase the military spirit or what the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had called public spirit. To him it was immaterial what sort of spirit it was if it produced that willingness to undergo the small amount military of training required by the regulations laid down in this Bill. It had been said time after time by members of the Labour Party that the scheme was the first step towards conscription, but it was nothing of the sort. The country was not going to be coerced into conscription, and no system of universal military training could be introduced in this country except with the almost unanimous consent of the nation. Continental countries had not adopted their system of compulsory military service from any love of that service or from any sense of their duty as citizens, but simply because it was necessary for their national security that they should maintain a great professional army, and if it could be proved that it was unnecessary to keep such a great standing army they would very quickly express their disapproval of it. He would like to read an extract from a manifesto by the Social Democratic Federation. The manifesto he alluded to said—

> "We want no class of men set apart from their fellows, but we want a national citizen force in which while every man will be a soldier no man will cease to be a civilian. Such a force is not conscription, which can only be successful by securing that every man shall be trained in the use of arms as a civilian."

He would commend those sentiments to the Leader of the Opposition. That was an extract from a manifesto issued by the Social Democratic Federation, and it read almost like an extract from any leaflet issued by the National Service League: some of the sentiments were most admirable. He thought they might congratulate themselves upon the great value such sentiments would have in raising the Territorial Army. The point was, would they be able to fulfil the aspirations expressed in that manifesto without compulsion? The underlying principle of one of the speeches which had been delivered from the Labour Benches was that they would be opposed to any reduction in the Regular professional Army until they had some civilian Army on a semi-trained basis on which they could rely. He for one would be very much opposed to any further reduction in the professional Army until they had the Territorial Army organised on a reliable basis. He supported the Bill because he believed that for the first time it, so to speak, co-ordinated all the different Auxiliary Forces into one uniform body and made the civilian community responsible for the maintenance, and to a certain extent responsible for the organisation of the new Territorial Army. In time of peace the civilian community had not sufficiently recognised its responsibility for the maintenance of the Auxiliary Forces. He believed this scheme did provide the organisation required, and it would form a reservoir and a vast reserve of men on a semi-military basis which could be drawn upon to reinforce the Regular professional Army in time of emergency. A great many hon. Members, especially on the Ministerial side of the House, had expressed some nervousness about the increased size of the expeditionary force. He did not think there was much danger, and he was sure there was no necessity to be nervous about that. They had the men on paper and they might as well organise them on paper. The bald fact remained, however, that the expeditionary force outside the administrative departments which was on a semi-Militia basis was the same as before, minus those by which the Regular Army had been reduced. A great many hon. Members had expressed various opinions as to whether the Territorial Army would be sufficiently attractive to get the number of men required. Upon that point his opinion was absolutely valueless, and he did not think anybody's opinion upon it would be worth much. Nobody could tell whether the Territorial Army now proposed would attract sufficient men to make it a success; they could only find that out after two or three years experience. He fully realised the great difficulty in the case of working men, especially those employed in skilled trades, in giving up even the little time required under the Volunteer Regulations. He did not, however, think that those considerations would justify a great many others who were often more comfortably situated, sometimes with complete leisure, and who had not identified themselves in any way with any branch of the Auxiliary Forces. He thoroughly agreed with the principles advocated by the National Service League, but he would like to hear a little less about the duty of the working classes in this matter and a little more about the duty of those who had a good deal more leisure. The hon. Member for the Abercromby Division had recently made a very interesting speech about the Swiss Army. He had praised the Swiss Army as a model for us to follow, in our Territorial Army. He had also referred to it as an illustration of the state of efficiency to which an Army can be raised if constituted solely on the Militia basis. He agreed with the hon. Member that it was an excellent model in that respect, but it was not true to say that as a fighting force it would be equal without further training to the professional soldiers of other Continental countries. He thought the hon. Member had left out of his narrative what must have been the most interesting part of the information he gathered when looking at the Swiss Army. The hon. Member did not state whether in the opinion of responsible people in Switzerland the same results could be obtained without compulsion. He himself thought he was right in saying that the opinion was almost unanimous that, without compulsion, the same results could not be obtained. The hon. Member had said that we approved apparently of the Swiss Army as a model for the Territorial Army because compulsion was imposed. But that was not the reason why we approved of it. It was because the Swiss system would give us the expansible system which everyone admitted was required in this country. We did not approve of it because it was constituted on the basis of compulsion. The hon. Member had said that with compulsion in this country we should find it more difficult to get men for the various punitive expeditions which we were obliged to engage in. But even if we had compulsion we should require a regular professional Army very much reduced, and this force would always be available for these expeditions. He never believed that there could be any difference in the fighting value of a man who was forced to be a soldier and a man who came forward voluntarily, provided they were fighting for a good case and had the feeling that they were fighting for national existence. He instanced the war in Manchuria as an illustration of that. He did not think that by the greatest stretch of imagination anybody would say that the soldiers on one side were animated by the idea that they were fighting for national existence and their homes many thousand miles away. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover had voiced the case of the Militia. Many people who had served in that force and who were at present serving in it naturally did not like it to be abolished. Nobody liked to be legislated out of existence, from the owners of public-houses to Militia battalions. A great many Members, no doubt, belonged to Militia battalions with fine old traditions, and pressure had been brought upon them to oppose the present scheme. But looking at it impartially, something had got to be done to reorganise the force. He believed that one of the truest statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover was that if they wished for uniformity in the Territorial Army, in the end compulsion would be necessary. He himself said, "Let us give the scheme a chance." It could only be seen in a few years time whether it would be a success. He believed it would be a success if they raised the pay of the Territorial Army to the pay of the Yeomanry. He suggested also that as an inducement everyone joining the Territorial Army of twenty-one years of age should have the franchise extended to them. If some privilege of that sort were conferred he thought the Territorial Army might be made a success, but unless they did something like that, and raised their pay to that of the Yeomanry, he did not believe they would get a sufficient number of men, so that they would be able to reject the physically unfit and yet get a sufficient number to make the scheme a success. Personally, he would be quite prepared if the scheme did not prove a success to support any right hon. Gentleman who would come forward and say that having tried every other alternative there was nothing left but to have a small Regular professional Army for foreign service and a compulsorily trained civilian Army for home service. He believed that was a policy which would be in the end cheerfully accepted by the country.

*MR HUNT (Shropshire, Ludlow) said that a short time ago an hon. Member, on the other side of the House, speaking as a Volunteer officer, stated that compulsion was impossible. He ventured to ask "Why?" and the hon. Member replied, "Ask your constituents." He had asked his constituents, and his difficulty with them so far had been to get anybody to oppose compulsory military training at all. He believed that if hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House would take their courage in both hands and tell their constituents that it was the duty of every man to learn enough to be able to defend his country in times of great national peril, it would not only do them no harm politically, but would probably in most cases do them a considerable amount of good. The hon. Member for Leicester had told the House that he was entirely against anything like teaching children in schools military exercises, or teaching them to shoot. The hon. Member said it would have the effect of causing them to believe that force was a remedy. He himself believed that it was absolutely true that force was really the only ultimate remedy. He put it to hon. Gentlemen opposite who did not believe in force, and especially to one hon. Gentleman opposite who was now there: If it had not been for the "gentlemen in blue" how could they have prevented the seried ranks of the gallant suffragettes from invading the sacred precincts of the House of Commons? That he thought was distinctly a case in point. The only thing that really told ultimately in this world was force, and they must recognise that that was absolutely true. The hon. Member for Stoke, who was a trained soldier and must know what discipline meant, had told the House that if this country was invaded one night the next morning there would be a million dripping bayonets. He thought the hon. Gentleman who had seen much active service and had honourably gained His Majesty's medals should not tell people that sort of thing. To begin with, there were probably not a million bayonets in the country. He did not think there were a million rifles. He believed that a regiment of trained soldiers from the Continent would swamp our patriotic million of men who were armed simply with bayonets. It seemed to him that this new Army scheme would put the country in an even more dangerous and defenceless position than at the present time. It appeared that under it we should be short, counting their Reserves, of very nearly 40,000 of our best trained infantry, besides losing somewhere about 3,800 trained artillery men, with no certainty whatever of getting any other force to make up for their loss. They could not make trained artillery men in much under three years. The Secretary of State for War was built on Herculean lines of physique as well as of intellect, but he appeared to be trying to get a voluntary Army on the cheap, and that was a very difficult thing to do, even in a country like this of heavily taxed imported necessaries and also heavily taxed exports.

And, it being a quarter-past Eight of the Clock, and there being Private Business set down by direction of the Chairman of Ways and Means under Standing Order No. 8, further Proceeding was postponed without Question put.

LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. CHARLES ROBERTS (Lincoln) said that there was a point of some public importance involved in this Bill, to which there was a very wide opposition in his constituency, because one of the provisions gave power to obstruct the waterway over the river Trent by the erection of a bridge across it. That waterway was of real importance and value to many industries in that part of the country. He was informed that some 2,000,000 tons of traffic passed up and down it in the course of a year. The bridge was proposed to be erected at such a point that owing to the rapidity of the tide and the shifting nature of the channel it would prove a most serious obstruction to navigation, if it did not lead to the practical cessation of the use of the waterway. He had a Motion on the Paper "That the Bill be read a second time this day six months," and if some modification of the plans were not made to secure the unimpeded navigation of the river, he would reserve his right to continue his objection to the passing of the Bill. His contention was that great railway companies had no right to cripple and strangle the waterways of the country.

*THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. KEARLEY, Devonport) said there was no doubt that this particular Bill was of great interest to the district where the proposed bridge was designed to be placed. The Trent was unquestionably an important link in the system of inland navigation between the Midlands and York, and the opposition to the bridge represented by the numerous petitions against the Bill was not confined to one particular locality. The Trent was a most important river; and the Board of Trade had a particular interest in the matter as trustees for the public in the oversight of tidal rivers. The Board of Trade had sent down one of their technical advisers who had investigated the subject thoroughly on the spot and had prepared a Report which would be presented to Parliament within the next few days. That Report would be available for the use of the Committee upstairs, and Board of Trade witnesses would be available to be examined by the Committee. He therefore asked the House to send the Bill to the Committee upstairs, and he could assure his hon. friend that his constituents would have the fullest opportunity of bringing their case before that Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

TERRITORIAL AND RESERVE FORCES BILL.

Postponed Proceeding on Amendment to Question [9th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Which Amendment was—

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House, though anxious to increase the capacity for expansion of the Forces of the Crown in time of war, regrets that the Government should make proposals which, while destroying the Militia, discouraging the Yeomanry, and imposing new and uncertain liabilities on the Volunteers, would not, in a period of national peril, provide an adequate force for Home defence or prompt support for the Regular Army in the field.'—(Mr. Wyndham)—instead thereof, resumed."

*MR. HUNT, continuing his speech, said that it appeared to him that the Secretary of State for War, a Liberal Minister, had been obliged to go down on his bended knees to the Lords-Lieutenants of counties, Peers and country gentlemen—most dreadful people according to Liberal ideas—and beg them to subscribe handsomely, and to use all their social influence in order to make this Bill work in an economical and satisfactory way. The Liberal Party, it seemed to him, had fallen rather low when they had to face the real situation in office, considering that they began their career with such high hopes and proud aspirations. Many hon. Members on the Ministerial Benches had told them that this country would never have conscription; but some of them did not know what conscription meant. They had mixed up universal military training with conscription. Conscription meant the taking by lot or by force a certain number of men of the country who were then compelled to serve in a long-service aggressive army for a number of years and compelled to fight in any part of the world to which they might be sent. Universal compulsory military training, on the other hand, was the most democratic Army scheme that had ever been invented, and the most just. No man under it was obliged to fight except in defence of his own country. Rich and poor alike served in its ranks. He thought it was a great pity that the people of this country did not understand the difference between the two. It appeared to him as if, to a great extent, this country was ruled by words, and he hoped that in time the people would learn that conscription had really nothing whatever to do with universal military service. In regard to the Yeomanry, as far as the regiment to which he belonged was concerned, this Bill would take away from their pay something like 3s. per day. The men now got 5s. 6d. a day, but that was to be reduced to 1s. 6d., and as their messing now cost them 1s. a day, it meant that they would lose 3s. a day during the training. That was a very serious matter, because the men consisted chiefly of small crofters, gillies, gamekeepers, and when they went home from the Yeomanry training some of them took back with them as much as from £8 to £12, which was a great help to them to get over the winter. On those lines, he thought the Bill would do a great deal of harm to that class of Yeomanry. On the other hand, in other regiments the big farmers came out, meaning to have a good time as well as for patriotic feeling; and the Bill would have a bad effect on them, because they would have to pay out a considerable amount of money instead of, as at present, being able to live well on their pay. By doing away with the Militia, the Bill would make it more difficult to get recruits for the Regular Army than at present. With the exception of 75,000 men the rest of the National Army would be rather less fitted to face an invading Army than the Militia and the Volunteers at the present time. He thought that the War Minister had begun his training at the wrong end. If the right hon. Gentleman had begun with six months training the Territorial Army might have been very useful, but it was perfectly ridiculous to imagine that foreign nations were going to allow us six months to train our men in order to suit our convenience after the outbreak of war. He thought the Volunteers and the Militia to a large extent came from different classes, and it was quite a question whether the War Office could induce them to be mixed up together, eight or ten in a tent in peace time. The range accommodation in many of the camps was very bad, and as the time in camp was only ten clear days he did not see how the men were going to be properly trained. Ten days clear was not more than enough to train a big battalion in musketry alone, and how they were to be trained in that and other matters in the time he was quite unable to understand. There was another point which he thought would affect the Volunteers very seriously. Formerly the Militia had always stood between the Volunteers and embodiment, but now it seemed there was to be nobody to stand between the Volunteers and that operation, as the Militia did in 1882, and all those who formerly served in the Volunteers would be liable to be called up at any time when danger threatened for six months of continuous military service. He thought it was extremely doubtful whether the Volunteers or those who were suitable for the new Territorial force would accept the very severe extra responsibility. Another thing which seemed to him very difficult was, how the Field Artillery were to be trained during such a very short time to be of any real use in war. There would also be a difficulty about getting officers now in the Militia to join the new Territorial force, as about a third of them did not live in the county in which they now served. He was told that the majority of the Militia officers absolutely declined to serve in this new force of 75,000 men. It seemed to him that under this scheme they would destroy the Militia and reduce the Volunteers without any certainty of getting men to fill their places. Even supposing that they did get the men and the officers, was it in any way fair or right that 300,000 men, out of many millions, should take upon themselves alone the whole of the self-sacrifice and risk of defending their country in time of national peril? It did not seem to him in the least fair. Many of these men would be artisans, mechanics or clerks, earning perhaps two pounds a week as long as they kept their health. They probably got only about one whole week's holiday during the year, and yet for the sake of serving their country they devoted that holiday to attending their annual training, whilst there was a considerable number of men who had been left a good bit of money by somebody, and who had plenty of time and leisure, but who did not do anything to fit themselves to serve their country in time of need. For himself he could not help thinking that if they could have thrown a net over the 80,000 young men who attended the great football match the other day at the Crystal Palace as spectators only, it would have been a very good thing indeed to have secured them and put them through four months continuous military training and instruction. He could not help thinking that the Secretary of State for War might as well have grasped his nettle and proposed four months continuous military training for every man once in his life between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one, and also military drill and shooting in all schools, for all boys over eleven years of age. Surely it was not too much to ask of every young man who had the privilege of being a member of the British Empire that he should undergo this small amount of training. He thought that if the question were fairly placed before the people of this country they would be very glad to agree to it. His own experience was, that although in his constituency, just before Parliament met, they held four meetings in four towns in different parts of the division—one of them in particular where the political views of the people were opposed to his—they could not get anybody to oppose the principle that it was the duty of every man to learn enough to be able to defend his country and his country's women and children in time of need. If British men were not able and willing to defend their country, and their country's women and children, who could be expected to do it for them? They might at all events perhaps agree that although we were a most peace-loving nation it was impossible for us by peaceable means to make other nations the same. It had been our boast for a great number of years that we were a free country, and what he was trying to impress upon the people about him was that if we wanted to remain a free country we must be prepared to fight for our freedom like all the other great European nations. The idea was quite recognised by all sections of society in other countries, including even the Socialists, that it was necessary for every man to go through a certain amount of training, and our greatest soldier, Lord Roberts, who had spent practically the whole of his life in defending the British Empire in wars that had been forced upon us, although he was now at the age of seventy-four, when he certainly could claim to have earned a well-deserved rest, was occupying the last years of his life in going about and telling the people of this country that it was absolutely necessary for their safety that we should have universal military training; and, he told them that unless we did have it we should certainly drift into hopeless disaster. Lord Roberts said—

> "For the sake of all they held dear let our people bring home to themselves, what would be their position if Great Britain lost her power, her wealth and her Colonies."

The warning was given with the plain directness of a great soldier, and was surely a warning that we had no excuse for neglecting. The last time that a great fleet set forth to invade our shores, when it came in sight fires were lit on all the great hills of Britain, and in the country all the men, and he believed all the women, were ready, prepared and armed and willing, nay anxious, to defend their native land. He wished it was so now, and hoped it might be so before very long. We had, however, for so long a time been spared the horrors of having a foreign Power on our shores, that we were in great danger of forgetting the awful possibilities of it. It was very difficult indeed for the people of this nation to recognise that at one time during the Boer War this country was practically denuded of trained troops, and that both Lord Lansdowne and Sir E. Goldie had told us that this fact produced the most perilous international situation, and was full of peril to the Empire. Colonel Lonsdale Hale had told them that he had felt it his duty to tell both the civil and military authorities that at one time during the Boer War 50,000 picked troops of any of the great continental nations could have walked from one end of the country to the other. Were these the sort of risks we ought ever to run again, especially considering that the Boer War was really a small one compared with those which in all probability we should have to fight in the future? Let hon. Members just consider for a minute what their feelings would be if a foreign enemy got an entrance into the town in which they lived. He did not exaggerate when he said that if an enemy got into London it would mean, as the history of maritime nations of the past showed, and as Lord Salisbury had said, the end of the history of Britain. The Duke of Wellington left us a very strong warning in a letter to Sir John Burgoyne, in which he stated that from North Foreland to close to Portsmouth, infantry could be landed with very great ease, and if they had been landed, there were at least seven harbours where they could land their artillery and cavalry. Napoleon, Wellington and Moltke, all thought the invasion of this country practicable, and Lord Wolseley had given us even a stronger warning, and had told us what the plucky fishwives of the East of London would do with the War Minister and his colleagues if they caught them in Downing Street if Great Britain was ever caught napping and was invaded by an enemy. The leaders of the people of a great country not so far off by sea from here were telling their people that they must gain the supremacy of the sea, and that they must prepare for war with this country. That country had great ports where it could embark a great number of men at the same time. It had got 4,000,000 men who could be mobilised on a telegram from their Emperor. There was not the least doubt that but for our "wet ditch" it would be perfectly easy for that country to overrun and conquer us whenever they chose. If we were obliged to keep our ships tied to our shores it would be impossible to protect our food supply, and we should be starved into submission in a very short time. Those who believed in national defence had to contend with people who for generations had been taught to believe that the only thing that really mattered was to learn to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market, and who thought war could always be avoided by arbitration and universal disarmament. President Roosevelt had said that that was not possible; that it was not only most necessary to be prepared for war, but that it was disgraceful and cowardly to shirk war when national interests were involved. The hon. Member for Leicester had said that he did not believe in taxing people to preserve their country; and Socialists contended that the minds of the children in the schools must not be poisoned by their being taught to shoot. British Socialists believed that they would be able to prevent a war between Germany and England. The German Socialists on the other hand said quite plainly that Germany must be armed to the teeth and have a strong Navy. No country had been able to preserve its power, position and wealth whose sons had not taken the trouble to learn enough to be able to defend their country. History was full of examples of nations who had neglected this and who had gone down in consequence. The Dutch were a case in point. The Dutch of the Netherlands about the middle of the seventeenth century had a great mercantile marine and a great colonial empire and were in a position very like our own to-day. They depended on the sea for their food. They were the workshop of the world and were the greatest banking centre. They thought peace was their greatest interest, and trusted to alliances and their wealth, which they thought could buy armies to fight their battles, with the inevitable result that stronger nations conquered them and took their wealth and colonial possessions. Nations had not changed since those days. Nations still acted on the principle of the old lines—

> The good old rule, the simple plan,
> That they shall take who have the power
> And they shall keep who can.

As Moltke said—

> "It was only the sword that kept the sword in its scabbard. We gained our Empire and position by the sword, and by the sword we must keep it."

We must take the world as it really was, not as we thought it ought to be. When we became so civilised that a little man could hit a big one over the head and the big man would thank him and not attempt to retaliate, we could begin to talk of disarmament. At the present time, at all events, all history taught us that peace was only an interval between great wars, and the longer we enjoyed peace, the nearer we were to the next great war. We should, therefore, remember the great disasters that had overtaken other great nations, and prepare while there was yet time. Commercially-bred and commercially minded amiable people, who could not bear the idea that they, or any of those dear to them, should have to run the risk of being obliged to fight, tried to make us believe that war was always unnecessary, and could always be avoided, and in that way they prevented preparations for war, and so in reality did a great deal to make war much more likely. That sort of people objected to war because it would interfere with their comfort, and diminish their trade. The real remedy if we wanted to keep peace was simple. The children in our elementary and other schools should be taught British history and patriotism, the size and advantages of the British Empire, and that as their gallant ancestors, both men and women, risked, and often lost their lives, and endured great sacrifices to secure the Empire for them, so it was their bounden duty to be ready to fight for and preserve it for the future generations of the British race. It was also necessary for our safety that every man, rich and poor alike, should go through four months of continuous military training. That was not conscription or anything like it, and it had this great advantage, that it would improve the morale and physique of the nation and also increase our industrial efficiency. He thought an appeal should especially be made to the women of the British race. It was surely the duty of all men to learn enough to be able to defend their country, and was it not also the duty of women to see that the men did not shirk their duty? If we could get the women of Britain to understand the absolute necessity of universal military training for their own and their country's safety, he felt sure they would have Cabinet Ministers and politicians of all sorts tumbling over each other in their anxiety to bring in a Bill for that purpose. It was only a short time ago in a letter to the Morning Post that a woman said that women should take up miniature rifle shooting to encourage the men, and in reply to a question as to what would happen if the men did not take it up, she said that women should learn military drill so that in time of national peril they might be able to defend their homes, their children, their country and their men. When the next great war came, as come it certainly would, unless the nation was trained to arms, our women would see the trains or ships fading slowly out of their sight, carrying all they held most dear among the troops to the front, and many of them would know that for months their sons would be mere targets for the enemy, with no knowledge of how to defend themselves in modern war. So it was in the South African War, and so it was bound to be again unless the nation was roused from its fatal apathy, and our men recognised their responsibilies. Surely we should all try to put an end to our present defenceless state. It was well within the power of women alone to bring it about that there should not be a British mother in these islands who would not be proud that her sons were willing and able to defend their country in time of peril, and not a boy or girl who would not point the finger of scorn at any lad who shirked his first duty to his native land.

*Mr. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said the point to which he wished to address himself was that there was no necessity for this Bill as no great danger confronted us. It was said that the Bill was not likely to lead to conscription, but to his mind it made conscription very easy. The one great danger to the peace of the world was the Press. If the Press of this country could for a few months be muzzled and prevented from making irritating abominable statements from day to day there would be no danger of any attempt being made to invade the country. He was not sure that the time was not approaching when the same law would have to be applied to the writers of inflammatory articles in the Press that was applied to people who incited others to break the peace and commit murder. In March 1905 the late Prime Minister in answer to a question by Colonel Welby, as to whether there was any danger of this country being invaded, said, as Chairman of the Defence Committee, that they were clearly of opinion that invasion of these islands in such force as to inflict a fatal blow or to threaten our independence was impossible. He added that the considerations which it seemed to the Committee of Defence ought to govern the number of troops to be maintained, depended on the claims which Colonial and still more Indian needs might make on our military system. The words of the late Prime Minister on the question of invasion were very emphatic. They had also the declaration upon the subject of the right hon. Gentleman who was Minister of Education last year, when he was severely heckled in regard to the introduction and teaching of rifle shooting in elementary schools. On 29th March of last year he himself asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he considered this instruction necessary for national defence, and whether there was any new danger confronting the country which rendered necessary increased preparation for war. The right hon. Gentleman replied that he did not regard rifle shooting in elementary schools as necessary to physical training, and he did not consider it necessary for the purposes of national defence; he was not aware of any danger threatening the country. That was another emphatic declaration added to that of the late Prime Minister, who, as Chairman of the Defence Committee, had access to all expert information, and knew well what he was talking about. There was no danger of invasion, and there was no necessity for this Bill. He was trying to take a common sense view of the question, and he was not to be frightened by any spectre of invasion. Five years ago this country was practically denuded of troops during the South African War, and then, if at any time, was the opportunity for an invasion of these shores; yet there was no manifestation of any desire either on the Continent or anywhere throughout the world to take advantage of our defenceless condition. It should also be borne in mind that we were at that time the best hated country in the world. He had at that time received letters from friends in many parts of Europe which showed the state of feeling on the Continent against us; and the last time the late Lord Pauncefote was on a visit to this country, and after he had travelled on the Continent, he almost shed tears in describing to him (Mr. Cremer) the state of opinion against us which he found everywhere on the Continent, and the hatred that prevailed against this country in consequence of the action we were taking in South Africa. At that time our only ally was the Sultan; the French Press was almost unanimously against us, he only knew of one exception, and in that instance the proprietor had to come over to this country to raise funds to continue the one journal which supported the British Government in its action in South Africa. That was the state of feeling abroad, and that was our defenceless condition at home, yet there was no attempt at an invasion of these shores, and such an opportunity was never likely to occur again. Since then Russia had fallen to the position of a third-rate Power, her fleet had been destroyed, and her internal dissensions rendered it practically impossible that she could take any active steps to attempt an invasion of this country. Yet not many years ago the Russian bogey was trotted out to frighten us into complying with demands for a stronger Navy and a stronger Army. Was there any danger to be apprehended from France? The changed relations between this country and France was the most remarkable, he believed, to be found anywhere in history. Thirty-five years ago, when they began their agitation for international arbitration, they were laughed to scorn, yet they could proudly say now that these two countries, England and France, who for generations had been engaged in fighting each other, had concluded a treaty of arbitration. That treaty was followed by a Convention, partly appointed by our Government and partly by the French Government, with a view to healing the old sores which had been running between the two countries for generations. The Convention met, and succeeded in achieving that object, because there was a desire to do so. An agreement was drafted and submitted to that House about three years ago.

The Jingoes in the House, when the agreement was presented for ratification, shrugged their shoulders and said: "Yes; those Frenchmen have got the best of us, and for the future we shall have to play second fiddle," but they did not divide the House. In the French Parliament, the Chauvinists also shrugged their shoulders and said: "Yes; John Bull has got the best of us and we shall have to play second fiddle," but they did not divide the Chamber or Senate. And since the date of that Convention there had not been a cloud on the horizon between this country and France. The French bogey had been laid like the Russian bogey. Never was there a time when our foreign relations were so friendly as they were to-day. And yet this was the time when an attempt was made to Germanise our Army. For these reasons he had decided to give the Bill his determined opposition. The pioneers of arbitration treaties had always contended that if any two nations would take the initiative in concluding such treaties their example would be followed by other nations and that contention had been fully justified. There were already eleven treaties of arbitration to which this country was committed, and which had been concluded since the first treaty was made between France and England. No less than twenty such treaties had also been concluded by civilised Powers, and this country had been parties to eleven of them. That was a great point gained, and he commended it to those who believed that man was a fighting animal, and that the old state of things would go on until the end of time. He had visited other countries and he knew something of their opinion upon the subject of invasion, and he did not believe that any country entertained the slightest intention of invading us. Was there any danger of the employment of the Italian Fleet to invade our shores? We were now on excellent terms of friendship with the Government of Italy, who was one of our most faithful allies. Was there an hon. Member in the House of Commons who did not believe that if there was any danger of this country being annihilated one of the first Powers to come to our rescue would be Italy? Italy was grateful to this country for what we did for her during her hour of trial and for helping to build her up into a great nation. Spain was also one of our allies. Austria had quite enough to do to hold together the various races which composed that heterogeneous Empire. Therefore there was no danger to be apprehended from Italy, Spain, or Austria. As regarded the Scandinavian States the best possible feeling existed towards this country. The United States were also upon the best possible terms with us, and if anyone was to get up at a meeting in the United States and talk about a war with England or an invasion of this country by the United States he would be laughed to scorn. Therefore there was not the slightest danger to be apprehended from any of the Powers to which he had referred. It was quite true that there was one solitary Power concerning which some misgivings were entertained, but that Power said exactly of this country what we said of them. They had a Press of the same type and character as we had, and if the German Press and some of the English Press were muzzled for a few months the feeling of anger would die out, and very little would be heard of the danger of England attacking Germany or of the Germans attacking us. Did any man in his senses believe that there was any real danger to be entertained because of the feeling of enmity which had been stirred up and fanned by the Press of the two countries? He happened to know something about the opinion of the people of Germany, and from his own experience he was satisfied that no people entertained more friendly feelings and sentiments towards English men than the Germans. If an attack was made upon this country by the Emperor of Germany, or even if he dreamt of such a thing, so friendly were the German people towards us that he believed they would repudiate any such design or intention. That was at any rate his own experience amongst the people of Germany. He would like the promoters of this Bill to tell him what was the danger they apprehended, and where it was likely to come from? Where was the enemy that had manifested the slightest desire to attack this country or invade our shores? He hoped in the reply which the Minister for War would presently deliver he would be good enough to tell them whether he was of the same opinion as the late Prime Minister and one of his own colleagues whose opinion he had already quoted, or whether he could prove that there was any real danger which necessitated the establishment of an Army on the lines laid down in this measure. It had been said that man was a fighting animal. He did not know whether that was the opinion of the Minister for War, but it was a favourite dogma with some people who opposed them when they tried to get arbitration substituted for war. It was possible that there was a good deal of the animal in their nature when they first came into the world, but those who claimed that man was a fighting animal should do their best from birth upwards to subdue the animal, and develop the moral and intellectual sides of their characters. He believed that this Bill would not do that, but develop and increase the fighting instinct, and that was sufficient reason for him to oppose its passage into law. Then there was the proposal for assisting and fostering cadet corps. He thought that the danger of that proposal was fairly well pointed out by the hon. Member for Leicester. If however, the Bill reached the Committee Stage he would move to omit those dangerous clauses. He was exceedingly sorry that the Secretary of State for War had thought necessary in this Bill to give aid and encouragement to institutions which up to the present had been purely voluntary in their character. Some of them for years had protested against the growth of militarism in our elementary schools. In the first place they protested against the introduction of the drill sergeant because they did not believe that it ought to be the object of education to encourage fighting. He well remembered the specious statement made at the time when the drill sergeant was introduced into schools and how military drill was defended on the ground that it set the children up and made them more obedient; but he believed that it was calculated to make children not obedient and independent, but subservient, and what they wished to see developed was manliness and independence, not subserviency. If they desired to see the result of militarism let them go to Germany. He was afraid that the frequent visits of the War Minister to Germany and the military system which prevailed there had influenced him in drafting this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman was a gentleman of very great ability, with the best possible intentions, but he was afraid he had gone astray and had allowed himself to be influenced by military rather than higher and nobler motives. There had been a great deal of contention in that House during the last two or three years upon the question of education and the teaching of religion in our elementary schools. Side by side with that there were a number of hon. Members who believed that the drill sergeant ought to have a place in their elementary schools. They believed that the drill sergeant should follow in the footsteps of the schoolmaster. If that was done the schoolmaster would, in giving religious instruction in the morning, teach the children to love their enemies, and in the afternoon they would be taken in hand by the drill sergeant, who would teach them how to shoot them. The paradox of teaching children in the morning to love their enemies and in the afternoon to shoot them was one of those things which he could not understand or reconcile.

MR. HUNT said they would only shoot when attacked.

*MR. CREMER said he apprehended a great deal of danger from the development of this fighting instinct. He would read to the House an instance of what he meant. In one of the Wiltshire villages, at an annual dinner, in responding to the toast of "The Volunteers," the speaker—a Volunteer—said, "Perpetual target practice was so dull that they sometimes felt they would like for a change to put a bullet through a human being." The danger was that this instinct begun in the schools would be continued and developed in the cadet corps and rifle corps. Up to the present time cadet corps had been purely voluntary, but if these two clauses were retained in the Bill they would receive official sanction. He sincerely hoped that when they came to the discussion of the clauses the Minister for War would consent to their omission. He opposed the Bill because he believed it was an attempt to Germanise the British Army. It would be a sad day for the liberties of this country if militarism in any thing like the form in which it was to be found in Germany were introduced. He also opposed the Bill because he believed it to be absolutely unnecessary, there being no danger to be confronted. He further opposed it because he believed it was calculated to develop the fighting instinct among the people of this country. It was an attempt to militarise our institutions, a thing against which he and some of his friends had been protesting for a good many years. He believed it was the duty of the State to cultivate, not the destructive, but the constructive, side of our natures. For these reasons he was exceedingly sorry to find himself in the painful position of having to decide between loyalty to Party and duty to conscience, but on this occasion he could not strain his conscience to the breaking point, and consequently he would be impelled to enter the division lobby in opposition to the Bill.

Mr. D. DAVIES (Montgomeryshire) said he had seen with regret an attempt to knock the bottom out of the Bill and at the same time the determination to reject any solution on a compulsory basis. What then was wanted? They would be extremely glad to know what remedy it was proposed to apply to the present position of the Forces of the country. It appeared to him that the present Bill brought a new principle into operation and made a new departure which no other War Minister had ever attempted in the course of our history. It brought the Volunteer Forces into direct contact with the people as a whole. It must necessarily force the onus of responsibility on the local authorities themselves. One hon. Member had told him that the Volunteers were either overloaded with praise they did not deserve or looked down upon and every obstacle placed in their way. That to a great extent was very true. The other day he was at a Volunteer dinner where one of the persons present alluded to the Volunteers in the most eulogistic terms, yet the following week he prevented several of his employees from joining a Volunteer corps. There were a good many people in the country who adopted a similar attitude. Once they impressed on the local authorities their responsibility the attitude towards the Volunteers would be very different. The position of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London seemed to be somewhat incomprehensible. So far as he himself was concerned he spoke from several years experience as a Volunteer. He believed that in adopting the county as a unit they would call forth patriotism and esprit de corps and bring in usefully a certain amount of friendly rivalry among the counties themselves. He thought this scheme would introduce a great deal of the public spirit to which the Foreign Secretary had alluded in his speech when referring to the organisation and general tone of the Volunteers. With regard to cadet corps and rifle clubs, a good many Members on that side of the House had taken serious objection to the proposal to give them support. Again he would like to refer to what fell from the hon. Member for the Woodstock division when he told the House that it was very difficult to get men who came up from a public school or a university to join the Volunteers, because they had done a certain amount of drill in their schools. The hon. Member for Shoreditch had said that this system in the public schools introduced militarism into the country. Both those statements could not be correct. He had served in a cadet corps in a school where service was compulsory. He believed in the system of military exercises in the schools throughout the country. Men spent a great deal of their time at games and there was great indirect benefit from that in the way of moral training. The system of military training in the schools had already been tried with great success in our Colonies and in Japan. He believed that a great deal of the success of Japan in the recent war was due to the military training given in the elementary and secondary schools which had been introduced in that country. He strongly hoped that the Minister for War would not strike out that portion of the Bill but rather strengthen it and make it more efficient.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) said he ventured to offer a few words as an old Volunteer and one who had served in more portions than one of the Empire. The hon. Member for Shoreditch had given expression to laudable aspirations for universal peace. They did not share his confidence and belief that the time of peace was at hand. The hon. Member was on dangerous ground when he quoted scripture in support of his contention, because passages could be quoted on the other side. Shakespeare said—

> "The devil can cite Scripture for his purpose."

He was not entirely in accord with some of his fellow Members on that side of the House. He strongly welcomed what he believed to be the great effort of his right hon. friend to bring the military service of the country into something like harmony. In the last Parliament a number of them did their best to get successive Secretaries for War to raise the position and status of the Volunteers, but they were not very successful. They had asked for the raising of the status of the Volunteers; the right hon. Gentleman had attempted to raise it. They had asked for the better equipment of the Regular Army; the right hon. Gentleman had attempted to give it. He did not know whether his attempt to give the Artillery equipment to the Volunteer service had been sufficiently successful. They had asked that the financial responsibility should be taken away from commanding officers of the Auxiliary Army; that would be secured. They had asked for training with the Regular Army in the manœuvres; that had been granted by the late Secretary of State for War, and was to be continued. They had asked for greater facilities for rifle practice; they were to be granted. They had asked that the Auxiliary Forces should be put under a separate department at the War Office, which should have closer knowledge of their needs; but that separate department was not to be granted. They believed that with the development of the Volunteer service reductions in the Regular Army might be safely made. [OPPOSITION cries of dissent.] He knew that some of his hon. friends did not agree with him on that point; but he hoped they would allow him to state his case. He would never give his support to any scheme which suggested a reduction of the Regular Army if it did not also increase the efficiency of the Voluntary Army; but that would involve what the right hon. Gentleman had not given, increased expenditure on the Volunteer Forces. The reductions in the Regular Army would have given the right hon. Gentleman an extra £1,600,000 for the Volunteer Army, and he believed that the right hon. Gentleman had erred in not increasing the grants to the Volunteer Army. The right hon. Gentleman wanted an efficient but cheap Army, and a great many of his friends wanted a cheap and a small Army. The two things were incompatible unless the Volunteer Army was developed as it had not yet been developed in this country. The basis of the right hon. Gentleman's scheme was uniformity. The Militia, as he understood it, were to be incorporated into the Territorial Army, they were to pass through exactly the same training and receive the same pay as the Volunteers. Some hon. Members believed that the Militia were going to receive some training of their own. That, he thought, was a fundamental error. The right hon. Gentleman believed that with our peculiar conditions of society he could suddenly change those natural gradations which had drawn from different classes in this country men to join the Militia, the Volunteers, the Yeomanry, and the Regular Army. He was very much afraid that the right hon. Gentleman had been moved by two considerations; first, the consideration of what conscription had done in other countries; and, secondly, the belief that this was a democratic England, and that a democratic England should have a democratic Army. The right hon. Gentleman proposed two lines. The first one to go into barracks and be trained to serve abroad; and the second line was to serve for a certain period every year for a soldier's pay. But he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman's proposal would be so effective or economical as in the United States

There and in our Colonies they had no great public schools as in England. So far as education was concerned all classes met on the same grounds. The sons of the rich man and of the poor man went to the same school, and it was possible to get a democratic element in the education of the youth for the defence of their country. Whatever the future might bring forth, and whatever the apirations of the hon. Member for Leicester and his friends might be, there was a long road to travel before the different classes in England could be brought into one line in relation to the Army. The right hon. Gentleman's scheme wholly depended for its success upon the Special Contingent. He could not send into the field in time of war the number of men he had promised for an expeditionary force unless he had the Special Contingent. But the Special Contingent competed with the Volunteers and the Militia. He did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman could get the same kind of men to go into the Volunteers and into the Militia. There was something in the tradition and the history of the Militia and its drilling in battalions which drew into it, not only the corner boys, and men out of work, but a considerable section of the community who liked the old constitutional force, and who were prepared, if necessary, to go from the Militia to the Regulars. He asked the right hon. Gentleman if he thought that he could get men for the Special Contingent who could only drill in squads, which had no regimental prestige, and had nothing of the attractiveness which surrounded battalion co-operation? He believed that the right hon. Gentleman would find that instead of getting his full complement for the Special Contingent, he would only get those who were out of work and were driven to the last extremity. Therefore the right hon. Gentleman was running a great risk. He believed the Secretary of State would have been more successful if he had applied the county association scheme to the Militia, and thus revived the old county feeling which had subsisted for more than a century. Later on he might have applied the county association scheme to the Volunteers. The hon. and gallant Member for the Abercromby Division had said that compulsory service such as existed in Switzerland would be anti-pathetic to the will of the people of this country; but when the Ballot Act for the Militia was in force it was not necessary to apply it, for it was found that for every Volunteer asked for to serve abroad three were ready to offer themselves. He sympathised in the strongest fashion with the attempt which the right hon. Gentleman had made to give us a nation in arms, and if he failed no one would regret it more than he.

MR. HALDANE: I am grateful to the hon. Member who has just sat down for the tone of his speech. With all his criticism I am not in agreement, but his desire has been most genuinely and most obviously to bring to bear the best light he could on the extremely difficult problem with which we have to deal, and to help and not to hinder those who are responsible for its elaboration. I think I may go further, and say his speech has been perhaps typical in an extreme degree of the good temper and tone with which this debate has been conducted. Certainly no Minister has ever had the same cause to thank the House of Commons for the gracious reception of proposals about which, even when his opponents have not agreed, they have spoken with obvious earnestness and sincerity. There is one feature which has characterised the whole debate in a striking fashion. We have had many opinions put forward. One might almost say quot homines, tot sententiæ. Hardly any Member who has spoken has been in entire agreement with another. Many on this side of the House, while in agreement with the general principle, have demurred to particular details, and not the same details. On the other side there have been many who disagreed with the structure of the plan, but who agreed with many of the details, though not always the same details. What is the result of that? The result is that, notwithstanding what is called the reasoned Amendment which has been put down to the Second Reading, we have had no plan and no proposition from the other side to take the place of the one before the House. This plan holds the field. I say that with the more emphasis because in the Amendment, which is the official Amendment from the Opposition benches, if there is a plan foreshadowed—and I think there is one—it is not a plan which either accords with the opinions which have been expressed in the course of this debate or is in accordance with the traditions of the Party opposite. What is the substance of the Amendment? It is this. Organise not in two lines but in three; leave the Volunteers and the Militia and the Yeomanry on the present principle, improve them simply, and take that existing fashion of organisation as sufficient. But is that plan consistent with what was put before the House—and put before the House on behalf of the then Government—by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon? Why, Sir, the plan which was the plan of the Opposition when they sat upon this side of the House was a plan more sweeping in this direction than anything I put forward. It proposed, as regards the Regulars, to reduce not eight battalions, as I have done, in addition to the two of Guards, but fourteen battalions of the Line, including those very battalions with which it has been my duty to deal. It proposed to take the Militia and cut down many of their cadres—to convert them into something quite different from what they are now; it proposed to revolutionise the system of the Regular Army. It was a proposition which, I think, under different circumstances, and given men and money, neither of which, I think, were present in sufficient quantities to give the plan a practical possibility of success, would have had much to be said for it; but it was wholly inconsistent not only with the official Amendment that we have here, but with what was foreshadowed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin. In that state of things is the Opposition justified in pressing an Amendment to a proposal such as this? You may say, and you have said, that you put your finger upon various defects, as you consider them, of a serious character in the scheme; and both the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin and the right hon. Member the Leader of the Opposition gave us most fairly and fully reasoned accounts of the defects which they considered to be inherent in the plan. But, after all, there is something more that you have got to consider before you can justly, I think, press an Amendment such as this to a scheme which, say what you will about it, has, as you all agree, a good many things which give it an advantage over the present state of affairs—I am putting it at its lowest—and which has the Army Council and the Defence Committee at its back. After all, the plan which has been put forward rests upon the best thought and the best consideration that we can give it; and is the situation with which you have got to deal one which leaves you at liberty to go on without some attempt at drastic reform? I ask whether the situation, either as regards the Regular Army or as regards the Auxiliary Forces, is one which renders a continuance of the present state of things tolerable? The right hon. Gentlemen opposite thought not; they have produced in the last ten years two plans for changing that state of things; we have produced a third, and I think we have all been right. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon was absolutely justified in his criticism upon the existing state of things. When, on the introduction of this Bill, and in still more detail upon the Estimates, I put forward the reasons why we felt we were compelled to deal with the condition of the Regular Forces, I pointed out—and the facts which I gave were not controverted, and they could not be controverted—that our first line is full of gaps, that it is deficient in supports, and above all in provision to make up for the wastage of war. Full of gaps how? I merely mention the artillery in passing; it is not the most serious of all the cases. I have always thought that when you were passing from one kind of artillery to another—to a very quick-firing gun—it would be not unnatural that you should find yourself short in ammunition guns. And I only dwelt, earlier in these discussions, upon the gap in the artillery for this reason, that I have been myself attacked about artillery, and I pointed out that the reason why I was moving in the matter about artillery was because I had a very serious situation confronting me. It was this—that no more than forty-two batteries could be mobilised because of the amount of ammunition which these guns used. Well, Sir, I hope still to get sufficient men to mobilise the full complement of batteries—seventy-two, I think the number is—which we could find for the force, calculating its complete organisation. I hope that we shall be able to get a large number of men at any rate for the divisional ammunition guns. When that is done, and as that is done, I hope to replace the Regulars by Militia-trained men for that purpose. But not one man has been taken off the fighting men of the batteries of the Regular artillery up to this time. If we succeed we shall be able to do it, and we shall be able to keep the batteries manned with people who are trained up to that high point which, I agree, is absolutely necessary if your artillery is to be on a high level. I think the House listened with pleasure to the graphic description of my hon. friend the Member for Salford, to the most interesting and vivid account that he gave, with all the fire of one who had been trained up himself with the French artillery, of the battle of Saint Privat. I think we all feel the necessity of that high training if you are to have an ideal state of things in your artillery, and Heaven forbid that I or any other Ministers should cut down that as regards the fighting Army. But it is not that with which I am trying to deal. Our artillery stands as an illustration of the old fashion in which we try to do what no other nation does—to put every form of service, artillery and everything else, upon the highest professional footing. You will never get a sufficiency of men, because you have not a sufficiency of money to do it, if you take everybody for every service at that high level, irrespective of the extent and of what the service is. If you can fill your divisional ammunition columns with men of a lower degree of training, and if you can do something more with your brigade ammunition columns, then you will be able not only to fill up the gap that exists at the present time, but you will have your artillery not only as efficient, but more efficient than it is at the present time, certainly for not more money than you at present spend. That is in course of consideration, in course of being worked out. It is very difficult. There are many problems in connection with it, and I do not intend, speaking as a responsible Minister, to take action until they are carefully worked out. That is why I have not yet effected the reduction of a single man in the fighting element in the batteries of artillery. The garrison artillery is another question. What I am talking about is the horse and field artillery. When I come to other parts of the Line the defects are more serious. The Army Service Corps, transport, supply, all the various items which are essential to the Army are wanting. and, above all, that element which is necessary to make up the wastage of war by sending drafts. We have not got that. Our first line is in a seriously defective condition, and my proposition to the House of Commons is that the first duty of a War Minister is to see to the first line and to get it into a perfect condition. When you come to the working out of that, how do you stand? The Leader of the Opposition expressed a real regret that we had not been able to keep the Militia in their present form. I do not admit that we are destroying the Militia. We are destroying an antiquated organisation, but the Militia itself, the really historical Militia, not only are we not destroying them, but we are proposing to return to their original form. Until Mr. Pitt began to drain the Militia for the purposes of the Line, the Militia were a county force, recruited in the counties and of a local character. They ceased to be that. Why? Because they had become a mere adjunct of the Line, and because they were more and more ruthlessly used by the Line. What has been the result? The Militia have been going down and down the hill. They are between 30,000 and 40,000 short of their establishment, they are nearly 1,000 short of officers, and their condition is getting worse than before. Their organisation is antiquated and not up to the level of the time, and nothing but a revolution in their condition can put them back into a position which would justify the expenditure of such a large sum as is expended upon them every year. What we propose with the Militia is this. Put shortly, we say that the Militia contains two elements—the professional element, which has grown up more and more until they have become associated with the Line, and made them what they have been since 1882, completely under the War Office, and what we may call their original, historical, county element which belongs to them, which distinguishes the cadres, and which is there notwithstanding the extent to which they have been used for drafts. At the present time the Line is dependent on the Militia. It takes 12,000 men every year as recruits from the Militia force. It has to rely upon them for drafts—it has got absolutely nothing else to rely on to make up the wastage of war. Why is it necessary, for the purpose of assisting the Line, to deal with the Militia as we propose? There are two reasons. For the first, the right hon. Gentleman opposite has been a little responsible. In 1902 the right hon. Gentleman abolished the Militia Reserve, in which a large number of men took an engagement by which they were ready to go abroad as drafts of the Line, and most valuable they were in the South African war. But soon after the war, the Government with which the right hon. Gentleman was connected, abolished the Militia Reserve. They had the new short service arrangement, and they thought the three years system would give them not only a large Reserve but plenty of drafts. The drafts part of the scheme failed altogether, and the result was that the Regular Line was left in a condition far worse than it was before, because it had no longer the Militia to look to. It has been suggested that the present situation is the outcome of some temporary quarrel between the Militia and the War Office—that if we had been more tactful and conciliatory on both sides we might have got an arrangement by which the Militia would have been kept intact. That is not so. The situation is the outcome of prolonged discussions between the Militia commanding officers and ourselves. I have in this box a document signed by commanding officers that expresses their considered view after careful reflection. They say, "We are unwilling to furnish drafts for the Line, and we decline to do so." Some of them were willing to furnish drafts in companies; but of all the commanding officers of Militia, only four would consent to that course. The vast majority said that neither in individuals nor in companies would they furnish drafts to the Line, because they would ruin their corps if they did. I do not blame them for that course. Their cadres were getting smaller and smaller, and the situation was worse than it looked because of the habit of the Militia of taking recruits under eighteen years of age, and because, by reason of their bad organisation, the same man was often serving in several cadres. Their real strength was much below their nominal strength. The Militia were right in saying, "We won't give you drafts," and we were right in saying, "We must have drafts." The Militia is not a toy kept up for nothing. We spend £2,000,000 a year on it, and we must get the best value we can for our money. The best value was to make the Line as perfect as possible; and to do that, to take the professional substance of the Militia—the men who are not recruited locally—and assign them a definite duty. In military matters, as in others, there is no greater abuse than giving a man two functions. You cannot make him a Militiaman and a draft at the same time. If you do, you damage the cadre, and you will not have efficient machinery for supplying drafts. Therefore, we hit upon the plan, which has very strong grounds to commend it, of the third battalion, which is to be a training school for drafts and to take the professional substance of the Militia, and to furnish those corps in the form of drafts for the Line, willing to go abroad. The Militia cadre will go back to the county, and it will there take the recruit of a local character. But I do not wish that it should go forth that that course precludes the Militia in the counties from taking the new kind of recruit—that it shuts them out from a higher form of training than the mere eight or fifteen days of the ordinary recruit. It is a question of experiment and money. If experience shows that you can get men who are willing to take one month's recruit training, it will be a question for Parliament to decide whether it is worth while to spend the money in giving local recruits, if they come up, the sort of training which will bring them up to a higher level than that attainable by the recruits in the ordinary Territorial Army. But that should not be an exclusively Militia privilege; it should be extended to the entire Territorial Army. You may find that this Army is your strength and your backbone in the future; that, owing to changes in policy and circumstances, your expeditionary force need not be so large; and nothing is more likely to give you security in that conviction than to make the Territorial Force as real as possible. Therefore Parliament may wish to extend the training of the Militia battalions which will be territorial battalions at that time, with such troops as can be got for that purpose in the country; but experience alone can determine the question, and it is looking too far ahead for me to pronounce on it or make any proposition at the present moment. I only wish to point out that there is opened out opportunity for far higher training than would appear under the modest conditions of the Bill. I wish to say another thing. There is a class connected with the Militia with whom I have a great amount of sympathy, and that is, not the county officers, but the almost professional Militia officers who devote a great deal of time to giving training to Militia recruits and battalions. One would wish to make provision for them. If a Militia battalion with that class of officers says "We do not wish to go into the county, but would like to continue on a more professional footing," it is open to them to enlist individually, not as a cadre, into the third battalions of their territorial regiments. In that way we shall get our drafts; because they will undertake to go abroad, and their officers will go into the Reserve of Officers and get as good employment as at present. In that fashion, combined with the assistance that they would have from the Regular officers, working with them at the depots, there would be a sphere for the Militia officer and for the Militiaman much more real than any open to them at present. It has been said that, after all, the Militia battalions, weakened though they were, did go abroad and occupy foreign stations. I have pointed out that these third battalions on mobilisation might take a large number of the surplus recruits from the Reservists, and from the number of those people who always come in on the wave of enthusiasm at the outbreak of a great war. They will then throw off composite battalions, and we have provided for that possibility by having a number of Regular officers, Regular captains, who will be assigned to each of these battalions, and will be taken, of course, from the Reserve of Officers, who will come in if wanted. In that way we have substituted material from which no doubt we will get a certain number of composite battalions, I cannot say how many, to go abroad for the particular purposes for which the Militia were maintained. You do not want a great many of these battalions. We have got two Regular battalions on the lines of communication, but in addition we have provided twelve extra Militia battalions for this very purpose. In Ireland there are no Volunteers; and we think, therefore, we have a right to make special provision in the case of the Irish Militia. Each of the territorial battalions in Ireland will have its third battalion behind it, but the Irish Militia, which remains a Militia, we hope to consolidate into twelve good battalions to enlist under Part III., so as to be available for service abroad. They will be Regular battalions and not merely training schools for drafts. They will be Regular battalions; I do not care to call them Militia, because they come under the new provisions; they will be available to send abroad with their officers and will be able to undertake the duties which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin referred to. I now come to the Yeomanry. I have, of course, the greatest sympathy for the case which has been made out for the Yeomanry. Why have we been compelled to insist upon the necessity for a change in the force? It has not been done lightly. It has been done after the closest consultation with the General Staff. It has been done because we are convinced that, if there is to be a real military organisation in this country, it must be on two lines, and that the second line must be as nearly as possible of the pattern of the first line. Without that, we are certain that you cannot get either the just proportion of combined arms, or that sort of training, or that sort of spirit which is essential if our Auxiliary Forces are to be a reality. I have been a great deal among them; and I find that what they most desire is to be made efficient and to be taken seriously. Volunteers in every part of the country have said to me—

> "Do not be afraid to put duties on us if you will only make us efficient."

I am convinced that the way to make them efficient is to give them an organisation as nearly alike as possible to the organisation of the first Line, and to ascribe to them definite functions. The expeditionary force, with the Fleet which forms the complementary part of that force, are our first Line. The second or Territorial Line is this Territorial or Home Defence Force. I rejoice to think that, as will be seen in the newspapers to-morrow, the Colonial Premiers at the Conference have unanimously decided that this is the best pattern of organisation, and that just as we propose to organise the Territorial Force here for home defence, they propose to keep that pattern in view in the organisation of their home forces, so that we may have not merely 300,000 here, but a chain of Territorial Forces throughout the Empire which may give us some real security. I do not think that makes in the direction of militarism. I cannot agree with my hon. friend the Member for Haggerston whose sincerity I recognise, and whose services in the cause to which he has given his life we all appreciate. I feel that, in enabling the people to defend themselves, we are getting rid of that unrest and want of tranquillity which affords the greatest impulse towards compulsory service. I say that in our plan you have a bulwark against compulsory service. If you retain the present confused state of things it is impossible to predict what vicissitudes of political feeling or confusion in military affairs may bring about in the way of an impulse towards compulsory service. Therefore, we take our stand upon this Bill as a bulwark against compulsion; and we rejoice to find the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition is in accord with our view that the nation is not likely to turn to that remedy. I say, if we are to have any Army at all, let us have an Army fashioned in the interest of peace and tranquillity. But to return to the Yeomany. We have felt compelled to ask the Yeomanry to fit itself into this second Line organisation. That, of course, involves certain changes. It is impossible to justify the payment of the cavalry at one rate and the artillery and infantry at Army rates and, at the same time, retain to the Yeomanry their present rate of remuneration. But, while recognising that that cannot be done and about that we cannot give way, I quite feel the difficulty of the Yeomanry commanders in their desire to help us in any way they can in the unrest that the imposition of new conditions gives rise to. In the first place, then, every Yeomanry corps may go on enlisting men until this Bill becomes operative in that particular district, which probably will not be for twelve months, and the men enlisted may continue to serve for three years on the present terms; that will give them a transition period of three years. I have considered very much what has been pressed upon me from both sides of the House about the pay of the Territorial Force. I am very reluctant to start upon an extravagant footing, for I hold strongly to the doctrine that frugality is the foundation of efficiency in military matters, and that is the experience of the most efficient Continental forces, and it should be the beginning of wisdom with us. I do not want to cut down expenses too much, but I do not want to be extravagant. But we do feel it necessary to dissent wholly, the Government wholly dissent, from the suggestion put forward by the right hon. baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean in a speech which was characterised by a high capacity for making unpleasant suggestions as to the expense of the Territorial Force. He quoted the military correspondent of The Times, a great authority upon Army matters, and he spoke of the wisdom of the proposition that the force would require £7,000,000 or £8,000,000 to support it. Well, but what the military correspondent of The Times was speaking of was a suggestion of mine that he had before him in a speech I made in October. I have looked up the speech. He was speaking of a description given by myself of what might happen in a time of national peril when we might be driven to the length, in the emergency to which I referred, of keeping 700,000, 800,000, or 900,000 men in the field. The right hon. Gentleman said, truly enough, that to keep that force in the field would cost a great deal of money, and I daresay he was right in his suggestion that it would cost £7,000,000 or £8,000,000; I do not know. But I was speaking of an extremely exceptional and unlikely case, out of which we could not hope to get cheaply. But I propose a war strength of 300,000, and I doubt if, in time of peace, we should get to that; and estimates we put forward are not estimates that allow large cost for equipment, because this force will not grow up all at once, and men have walking dresses of some sort which we do not need to change all at once. We have not gone into that for it will be a gradual process of conversion, and we are dealing with people already equipped. The estimates we put forward were not "faked" estimates, but arrived at after careful calculations by the Financial Secretary and a competent staff of civilian assistants of the cost of keeping this Territorial Force in being. I believe they are calculated on a liberal scale, including salaries and a large allowance for horses. We have been pressed upon the question of allowance for rations and pay. What we propose is to give Army pay, and it has been said that the Army ration is worth about 6d., with a grocery allowance of 3d. That is said not to be enough to enable the Auxiliary Force representative to maintain himself in comfort. I am not sure about that, but, at any rate, we find that the Regular troops, when they come into camp, do have a little more from canteen funds and other sources. That justifies me in saying that in the case of the territorial men, without any violation of principle, we can make a certain camp allowance in place of the 3d.; and I trust the House will not think me departing from my generally frugal provision if I suggest that we should spend another £150,000 on the Estimate for the Territorial Force. We may have to go even £150,000 beyond that; but of this I am certain, the amount will not be large and will not do any particular damage to our automatic economies.

MR. WALTER LONG asked that the House should know precisely what were the terms before the Bill passed into Committee.

MR. HALDANE: I will undertake to manage that, either by distributing a supplementary document or in some other way, although I shudder at the prospect of distributing another document. But what we propose instead of the separate grocery allowance is to give a shilling camp allowance per man per day whilst in camp. That applies to the whole Territorial Force volunteering. The infantry as well as the cavalry and artillery, and especially the Volunteers, will not only be better off, but the officers will be substantially better off than at present. That I am quite sure can be done without extravagance. Rome was not built in a day. Neither will this Territorial Army be built in a day. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London put to me in a fashion which I admired for its conciseness, a question about the Army Reserve. I have got here the latest figures about the Army Reserve. At present it is at a total of 115,422. Our normal Reserve is 115,171. Why is it that sometimes the Reserve, according to the normal, and according to the actual strength, varies so? The reason is that the actual strength depends on varying and fluctuating considerations. They happen just now to coincide; but it is only the totals which coincide. For instance, I will take sections A. and B., including all arms. The normal strength is 89,986; the present strength is 98,585, so the actual strength is in excess there of my normal estimate. But what makes a difference is that section B. will, according to the normal, be 25,000, while at present it is only 16,800. The infantry of the line are 62,000 in sections A. and B., as compared with my normal 45,000. The other arms are just the other way. The right hon. Gentleman will see at once how difficult it is to challenge actuarial calculations. They may be wrong, but they represent the very best you can give, and the outcome of the whole matter is that the normal and actual at this moment apparently coincide, with the flunctuations of the character I have referred to. I come now to other points which have been rasied. There was, for instance, the question of Volunteer artillery. On that question I quite agree that you cannot hope to produce in the shape of Volunteer artillery anything like the effectiveness you get with the Regular artillery; but I do think that it is infinitely better to have trained Volunteer artillery — artillery trained as well as you can train them— than not to have them at all. After all, putting it at its worst, assuming that these guns would not be useful at the comparatively short ranges at which they would be most required in home operations—so the General Staff assure me—you have a large number of quick-firers in this country after the expeditionary force is taken out, you have the reserve guns and the training batteries. They will be there. You have got a lot of extra guns to which these skilled artisans, the people who make up the artillery, men who understand the technical work better than the trained artillery—these men will very soon knock into shape and be of real assistance, even if you only want them as drafts. I believe they will become competent artillerymen as part of the home defence force much quicker than you think, even though they may not come up to your ideal of perfection. If you want to know what training their men are willing to take up, ask some commanding officers, and they will say that they believe in Volunteer artillery, and that they have been able to bring their corps up to a considerable state of perfection. I think it is not only as part of the second line, but also for the sake of getting this trained element in the country, that it is worth while spending money and trouble in trying to bring up a force of Volunteer artillery such as the Volunteers have been asking for for some time past, and such as will form a real element in the second line. There was a brilliant speech by my hon. friend the Member for Leicester disagreeing with the plan of the Government and condemning it. He said many things deserving of attention, but I was unable to agree with the line he took on the various points he dealt with. He said the Volunteers are being put under half military conditions. The hon. Member I do not think realises that the provisions of this Bill reproduce with slight modifications the provisions of the model rules under which most of the Volunteer corps are. The condition of the Volunteers will certainly be no worse than under the corps rules at the present time. The period of enlistment, the terms of service, and so on represent very much what is the Volunteer practice at the present time. Then as regards martial law. It seems to be assumed that we are doing something new. But that is not the case. Moreover, it is not proposed to put the Volunteer under martial law in peace, but to bring him more, if he does offend, under the cognizance of the civil tribunal. In that respect, when we come to the Committee, I hope to be able to satisfy them that, so far from going back in this matter, we are going forward. Then there is the question of officers. It is suggested that we are shutting ourselves off from people who might rise from the ranks. We are not. There is a tremendous shortage of officers at the present time; we cannot get them from the ranks or anywhere else. We have been compelled to resort to other avenues for obtaining them. We are looking to the public schools and Universities. We have cadet corps and Volunteer corps in the Universities. That is what we have at the present time. There is plenty of military spirit there, and the more you try to put it down the more it will grow up. We shall do much better to let it take a useful shape. We look, then, upon this as a source from which we may fill up a gap which exists at the present time, but we shall be only too glad to see men rise from the ranks. At present the officer is very badly paid, though we are trying this year to make matters a little better in the case of battalion commanders; but do what you will, officers have to keep up a certain state—their own men would not tolerate them if they did not—and that means expenditure of money. Consequently it is difficult for a man to rise from the ranks to the position of officer. At the same time, we should like to create positions which would not involve that expenditure, so far as we can avoid it. We believe in taking every fit man you can find. Men have risen from the ranks to eminence before now, and it is through no desire to stop that process, but because we are face to face with an absolute shortage of officers, that we have taken the course we have. As I have said before, what we look to for making this second line is the fact that each man who enters it will engage in a great emergency, and it is only for a great emergency that this force is designed to undergo a further training, following on the previous training, to supervene on the outbreak of war. If that is done then we are advised and we believe that you will turn out men who month by month will be better and who will not only be able to defend the shores of their country, but—those of them who are willing—to go abroad to assist the Regular Army. That is to a great extent what we rely upon, and it is on that system, so designed and worked out, that we rest our hope of getting something like order in place of the chaos which exists at present. It is only so, that you will be able ultimately to get down the cost of the Army to a satisfactory figure. It is the wastage arising from want of organisation that is responsible for the heavy expenditure on the Army of which the people complain. In some respects there are things on which we can congratulate ourselves, and we must be thankful for such mercies as we have. I had before me to-day a calculation of the cost this year of the German Regular Army calculated upon our own basis, and it is over £46,000,000. We are fortunate in living in times when we are endeavouring to administer the Army as frugally as possible, and I hope effectually. This Bill comes up for consideration in its next stage in Committee, and the view of the Government is that it would probably be for the convenience of the House that this Bill should be treated as one of the kind that should be taken down stairs. That can only be if there is an understanding about time. We do not want to have to go on, if we can avoid it, in an autumn session. Therefore we feel it would be for the convenience of the House to have a time limit. I hope we shall be able to come to an agreement about that. We shall have the greatest desire to consult the convenience of hon. Gentlemen in all parts of the House, and to secure a sufficient and satisfactory discussion upon the large points of principle involved. Therefore, I propose, after the Second Reading, to move that the Bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House. In conclusion, let me say that I am quite aware that no Army scheme can hope to be ideal, or one against which it may not be possible to level criticisms that may be well founded. The whole subject is so intricate, the confusion is so vast, the subject-matter so extensive, that it is impossible to be sure you have reached the best solution. The plan which we propose is, on the whole, a modest plan. It is not ambitious, but it is a plan which we hope is a practical plan. We have done our best to hit upon an organisation which creates the least possible disturbance consistent with maintaining our first object—namely, to put our first Regular Line in a satisfactory state, and to introduce organisation in the Auxiliary Forces. It is in that spirit that we commend the Bill to the House, reciprocating the good-will shown by hon. Members in all parts of the House, and the general determination to try to make the best of this plan, whatever be its merits.
